A SUBSCRIBER.

To the Printer of the PITTSBURGH GAZETTE.

It appears that from the 1st of August, when the contagion first appeared...

30,000 remain behind. That markets are plentiful, beef, 7d. mutton, 5d. veal 7d.

On the first appearance of the disorder, its dangerous nature was not suspected.

Though terrible, it has not been generally fatal. Vast numbers of the sick from four to seventy years old, have recovered perfect health...

The desertion of the Philadelphia market threatened to add famine to pestilence, the alarm spread over the continent.

Instances of the like nature occurred on the Lancaster road. Even in Philadelphia, there have been many cases, and some of persons in great affluence...

As a traveller, who wandering through a barren waste, or the desolation of a tempest, sees, at the end, a fertile field, a verdant wood, a refreshing stream, and a fair dwelling...

Now, Mr. Printer, conceiving as I do, the injury is and dangerous tendency of this doctrine, I move and request that it be committed for discussion...

children and friends, more valuable and lasting, than all the wealth of the selfish and prudent man.

It is not to be supposed that these principles of benevolence, though most strongly called for, and therefore most strongly exerted, on the scene of distress...

Would it not become the people on this side of the mountains, to throw in their mite to assist our suffering brethren in the day of their calamity?

But there is also another way in which we may contribute to raise their sunk heads, and, in our measure, assist to lessen the effects of that calamity...

Our merchants will find it their interest to renew their dealings with Philadelphia. The long stagnation of trade requiring a sudden supply of money to support the credit of the merchants there...

Washington, Nov. 13th, 1793.

MR. FENNO, The doctrine propagated by some of the faculty in '93, and still insisted on, is pregnant with mischief, and more injurious to the prosperity of the city...

Knowing, however, as I do, that human ingenuity can invent and confirm whatever it pleases—invent arguments even to defend an error; I am led to believe the doctrine to be false and groundless...

Shall we, whose interest in the city is great, suffer it to be ruined by the fanciful assertion of a few doctors, who conceal themselves more wisely and knowing than they really are?

power. By way of conclusion permit me to observe, that the proscriptions of this doctrine have lost the confidence which they should study to preserve...

MR. FENNO, What purpose can any man expect to answer by informing us that 40 men have been found, whom it was impracticable to bleed to death? Reverse the card, and what figure does this number of names make along side the black list of victims to similar wanton experiments on human life?

For the Gazette of the United States.

MR. FENNO, In the agreeable romance of Gil Blas, we have an excellent summary of the materia medica of certain bloody disciples of Galen, so rampant in the revival of the lumatic system at a more modern period.

Le Sage, though he long languished in the shade of poverty and obscurity, in a little cottage on the borders of the Seine, and in the neighbourhood of Paris, where he gave birth to that excellent satire which has immortalized his name...

Some physicians, while they would avoid the dangers of this violent and desperate remedy, set up by some for a panacea, would wholly exclude it from the practice of medicine; and indeed it has been advanced by many ingenious physicians, that venesection in conjunction with emetics has destroyed more than the sword...
