Has nature invefted them with greater fenfibility or higher endowments? If shehas they must be manifested in private as well as in public life—look then at their private lives. Are they more correct in conduct, more virtuous, lefs felfish, lefs attached to their private interefts, lefs paffionate lefs re-vengeful than other men! If they be really inperior beings, they ought to give us fome joken-their mere word is not enough. Impostors in religion always come to men in the guile of superior fanctity, and civil impofiors in that of fuperior patriotifm-but the people have never believed in the one or the other without eating the fruits of bitterness and repentance. No-believe them not-their hands are not clean; their hearts are not pure. Their ways are too We apprehend this point was fubmitted to crooked to be right. Never would a true the opinion of fir Philip Yorke, in 1732, in patriot excite a foreign pation to make war the cafe of a Scotchman, who had been

it. Never would a true patriot use deception or propagate falfhood amongst the people for any purposes benevolent to them. It cannot be a good tree that brings forth thefe fruits. When a great people are in the tranquil enjoyment of civil liberty better defined and more amply fecured than ithat of any other people on earth—with a remedy for every right, a redrefs for every wrong, a cure for every grievance—and all this under a government of their own inflitu-tion, equally open and acceptable to all without diffinction or privilege to any the map who takes pains to alienate the affections of fuch a people from fuch a govern-ment and to excite them to a change, cannot mean to deal fairly with them. Let the people then beware how they give to men their confidence or admit the poilon of and folicitor general, on the petition of John their doctrines.

However it may be mingled with things fweet to the tafte and ferved up in tempting veffels obfequioufly, prefented, its baneful effect is not lefs fatal. However it may court their tafte amidft ineantations to liberty, or in its first draught, exhilirate the fpirits with a gentle intoxication, its after operation is on the blood where it corrupts the ma's and invades the feat of life. The difease has already disclosed symptoms fatal in their tendency. Those who are infected need to change their regimen speedily, and those who are found to avoid the atmost whofe malignant vapors communicate the contagion. Let the people in fhort with-draw their confidence where it is abufed, and fuffer it not to be diverted from where it is justly due. A true American can belong'to but one country, and that is his own—can love but one government, and that is the one the people have made.— The writer of this neither poffefing nor feeking any office of diffinction, afpires only to the character in the above fenfe, of
