Foreign Intelligence.

TRANSLATIONS From the Politisch Journal of Hamburg, 1798.

ITALY.

The first-born daughter of the French domination, in Italy, the Cisalpine republic, is treated by the mother republic as a step-child, and governed with such a wavering inconsistency, as is not likely or calculated to conciliate her affection, or endear the new state of things to the discontented people. Revolution follows after revolution, and one arbitrary stroke is instantly succeeded by another. This young republic, whose political existence is scarcely sixteen months old, has already in so short a space of time experienced four convulsive shocks and entire changes of government. The political revolution, which had been effected by the French ambassador, Trouve, had not reached the end of two months, when the order of things, which had then been established, was again annihilated.

The same derangement of finances, which seems to be the characteristic feature of the newly established republics in Europe, pervaded also the public concerns in Rome. Notwithstanding every kind of exertion and contributions, the scarcity of money was daily increasing. The people, though already exhausted, must pay a tax on their lands of two per cent. to defray the ordinary expenditures, which amount to one million scudi; and in addition to this, a new forced loan of three millions of livres, payable in three terms, has been imposed. By order of the French commandant, national property to the amount of three millions has been sold, the money to be paid within a month, for maintaining the French troops. At the same time the requisitions were continued, and the remaining bishopricks, churches and monasteries, compelled, under the name of a patriotic donation, to furnish 30,000 shirts, 10,000 uniform coats, 20,000 pairs of shoes, and 1500 beds for the French army. Industry was totally annihilated, and the harbour of Ancona blocked up by the British.

Still more disgusting were the murmurs of the people in the Ligurian republic. A new impost on salt, which was generally oppressive, and the suppression of monasteries and church establishments, that had been resolved on, served to increase the general discontent. An insurrection broke out at Lavagna, and still more violent commotions took place in Tarzana. Even at Genoa the legislators saw themselves exposed to the public insults of the people, and nothing but the strictest attention to military measures of precaution could maintain order.

In a similar state of dependence on the French, though for certain reasons somewhat less precarious, is the Grand Duke of Florence placed, who has heretofore endeavored to maintain a friendly understanding with the French rulers.

But a striking contrast is formed by the King of Naples, who opposed a noble fortitude and an unshaken firmness to the French revolutionary designs. A regular army of 80,000 men is ready to act for the defence of the country, while a militia of 100,000 men is constantly exercised in arms. All financial measures were taken, requisite to defray the expenses of a war; a new bank of paper was established, a tax on the revenues ordained, some church goods sold, and new extraordinary resources resorted to, by which the income of the state has been augmented from six to twelve millions of ducats, and the government enabled to make effective operations. Gen. Mack, who was appointed captain general and commander in chief of all the Neapolitan forces, directs the plans of defence. While these measures were going on, the new French ambassador, Lecombe St. Michael had his first audience with the king whom he assured in the politest terms of the pacific and friendly disposition of the French Republic, his language being entirely the reverse of the former arrogant style of the Pentarohs. Nevertheless, misunderstandings become daily more serious, and the political horizon is still involved in darker clouds. A rupture is momentarily looked for, and thought to be unavoidable.

The Italian coasts were every where menaced with aggressions from the British; Malta as well as Minorca is blockaded, the commerce and navigation of the Mediterranean sea is interrupted by privateers; and the French, who intended to drive the British entirely from the Italian territories and from the Mediterranean sea, were forced to yield the empire of the sea to the English.
