SAURDAY, JULY 2, 1864. SPIRIT OF THE NEW YORK PRESS.

THE MILITARY VIEW.

To our view, the military situation never, on the whole, looked so strong and so hopeful, in a large survey, as at this moment.

In the first place, our two great armies never were planted in positions at all comparable, as regards their advantages, to those occupied by them at this moment.

Grant's army is now the heart of Georgia, almost within sight of Atlanta. Even if Grant should be repulsed, he would have done more than any other general could do.

Look, again, at the other of our two great armies—that under Sherman. We have just learned that this officer was repulsed in an assault on the Rebel fortifications at Kennesaw Mountain.

It is not long since we heard that a considerable portion of Lee's army had been detached to guard the Danville Railroad.

It is strange that we should have brought the principles and methods of the new system of agriculture to the attention of the public.

It is well known that the new system of agriculture is not only a new system, but a new system of agriculture.
