HEADQUARTERS PENNSYLVANIA... We learn by parties who left Knoxville on the afternoon of Wednesday, and came by the steamer Boston to Kingston, and thence by the Missionary, arriving here at dark last night, that all is quiet on this side of the river. Wheeler had passed up on the north side of the river, through Blount and Sevier, attacking and capturing at Marysville a small force of the 24 Tennessee Infantry at midnight, and surrounded only after a large part of the town had been burnt and artillery brought to bear upon their place of retreat.

It was believed that Wheeler would attempt to cross the river above Knoxville, and make his way to join Morgan, after destroying the railroad bridge, and retreating to the mountains.

As far as we can ascertain, his movement, though attended with a good deal of pillage and private injury, has not been attended with any of those excesses which have marked the movements of the Rebels in this vicinity. It is believed that his force was approaching the city at once, and that the citizens were preparing to defend themselves.

Among the other names we learn were Captain John Hunter, W. G. Brownlow, John Newland, P. Dickinson, A. A. Kyle, Edward Friz, and Dr. James Rodger. The oldest and best citizens are the ranks and officers, with a mixture. There was little excitement, but an abiding belief that the place could be held, and a stern determination to hold it.

On Thursday night Hon. A. G. Watkins, a former year Representative in Congress for the first District, and a Dr. Harris, were brought to the city by the steamer.

What two-thirds of the Convention recognized in giving their vote to McClellan is unquestionably true—that the platform of the Convention is not of itself calculated to gain the favor of the people. The reasons are two—one negative, the other positive.

The negative reason is that the platform does not contain a syllable condemnatory of the Rebellion. Piety of space is found for denunciation of the Administration at Washington; but not a word is said in regard to the Rebels themselves.

A writer in Macmillan's Magazine gives the following account of Dr. Chalmers' speaking:— Again, as nature had given to Chalmers a mind capable of great contemplations, so he had given to him a heart full of sympathy and love for the most unfortunate of our race.

He was not in his habitual fervor alone when he spoke, but with a calmness and self-possession which carried into everything in the force and earnestness with which he felt his own wrongs. There was the roll and ringing emphasis of the voice in the act of delivery, the grip of each syllable as it came, the balance and no more movement of the body, the earnestness of the face, and at least, by way of gesture, the frequently uplifted arm. What was the strangest peculiarity of his delivery was the fact that he spoke in a low voice, and yet his words were heard by all.
