Cotton-Its Culture and the Prospect of Future Crops.

THE London Quarterly Review, in a recent article on Dr. LIVINGSTONE'S work on "Zambesi and its Tributaries," gives to the British public the following paragraph:-

"The basm of the Shire is characterized by a series of terraces, the first being below the Murchmen Falls, the second a plateau two thousand, and the third three thousand feet in altitude; it must therefore possess a considerable variety of climate; but cotton is extensively cultivates on all the terraces, and the population was everywhere observed to be engaged in picking, cleaning, or spinning it. As it is doubtful whether the cotton cultivation of the former slave States of America will ever revive under a system of free labor, any addition to our knowledge of the districts where a material so essential for maintaining our manufacturing pre-emmence can be easily and cheaply produced, becomes of the highest importance."

The idea thus thrown out is being gravely considered in England, and the main arguments advanced in favor of official support being given to the distinguished traveller whose work is exciting so much attention, is that by his explorations a country can probably be secured from which the mills of Manchester can be supplied with cotton, independent of the United States. Such a wish is very dear to the British heart. To be free from the bonds which bind her to America would be the culmination of her prosperity. She would sacrifice some of her wealth; she would pay a little more for another product than ours. She would do snything, so that it did not affect her profits, to break from her dependence on the United States. In her dosire to carry out this plau, the world has been ransacked to discover cotton-fields. An attempt was made in Egypt, but no cotton came. India was invaded, and the Sepoys made to act as field hands; but the expense of freightage increased the price, and the scheme was abandoned. A few small plantations near Cape Town furnish a score of bales, but taken as a whole, the efforts to secure cotton from other than the Southern States have been most unmitigated failures. The Government now designs to invade the mysteries of the Zambesi, and seek to cull some cotten pods from the teraces at Murchison Falls. The prospects of success in the new Quixotic enterprise are a little darker than those of its predecessors, and we may deem it decreed that the busy looms of Britain will have to continue, for many years yet, to come to our shores to secure they supplies.

This fact makes it a matter of importance for us to understand what is the present appearance of future crops. If the world is still to come to us for supplies, it is a question of vital interest to know whether we will be able to meet the demand. In view of the importance of furnishing the supply, it may be well for us to examine the prospect as given by an intelligent and well-travelled Southerner. In the last number of De Bow's Review is an able article on the cultivation of cotton, which, as the need of capital is the great clog which retards Southern progress, and as capital must come from the North, we will freely quote from.

DE Bow gives us what is most neededfacts, not theeries. To such of our readers as have money to invest, we would repeat the data of cost. In 1859, the expense of raising 350 bales, at 7 bales to a negro, was $5725. The value of that crop, at 5 cents a pound, was $7000. The profits, therefore, on the investment were less than $1500, which, when we think of the risk and the outlay, is a much less remunerative business than almost any steek investment. Hence, all fears of successful competition from any new plantations of Great Britain may be abandoned, as with us labor is cheaper, transportation lower, and the fabric finer than any which England could secure. Although cotton is now worth ten times its value then, yet any competition would cause it to fall to such an extent that the enterprise of Great Britain, based on the present exorbitant rates, would be a failure. Its very success would be its destruction. Like the cereus, it would expire bearing its flower. Therefore there need be no besitation for fear of a depreciation of price because of foreign competition.

The items of expense necessary to stock 500 acres of good land are given by DE Bow from personal experience:-

Oxen, carts, house, and farming utensiis	939 500
So much for stocking the farm. The rent expenses during the year, which necessary, are also given:—
Rent for 500 acres, @ $6	3900 3475

The total expense, then, for the first year, would am ount, on a fair average, to $19,000, or at the rate of $38 per acre.

Now let us see the profits. Setting aside one-fourth of the land for clover and corn, there would be left 875 acres, which Dn Bow assures us ought to yield at least one bale to each acre. At this rate the plantation would produce 168,750 pounds of cotton in one year. Its worth cannot be less than 35 cents, and will probably be nearer 75. Taking 40 cents, a minimum, as the average, we find the income would amount to $67,500-a pretty good return for a year's investment of $19,000 The time for planting is March and April; after the opening of May it is too late.

Having thus given DE Bow's figures in regard to the investment, let us look at his view in regard to the prospects of this year's crops. In his estimates, as in all things else he publishes, he speaks like a sensible, farseeing man. In 1860 the crop of all the South, with a fair season, would reach about 5,000,000 bales, but on the average it never went beyond 4,500,000. Taking this as a basis, let us view the results of the war. The negroes have been reduced in number one-fourth by death and disease, while we may safely say that in their present disorganized condition another quarter must be deducted from those who are willing to work. This, if all the land was cultivated, would yield 2,250,000 bales. From a long tour through the South he infers that one-half of the land is uncultivated, which would reduce the crop to less than 1,120,-000 bales. DE Bow thinks that 1,300,000 bales would be a fair estimate. We think that he rather underrates in one particular. We hold that free hands, working on a percentage, would do more labor than the slaves under the old system. We therefore believe that should the crop be put at 1,500,000 bales, the estimate would be perfectly just.

In concluding this glance at the prospects of the cotton trade, we cannot do better than quete, from the article from which we have drawn our figures, its closing passage, in which it says:- "Future years of emancipation may, and doubtless will, produce vastly improved results. Certainly the field is a wide one, and is open to enterprise and capital. We are among the hopeful,"

WHAT THE EX-REBEL LEADERS ARE Doing .- The sudden collapse of the Rebellion has enabled all of those who held office under it to say, with "Othello" that their occupation is gone. From high official positions, with great power and large emoluments, they were reduced by that one stroke of fortune to the position of penniless traitors, without money, character, or business. The deck has now been cleared of the chaos which followed the surrender of Lun, and let us se what occupies the attention of the leaders of southern chivalry. Davis and CLAY 8t'll are supported by the United States. MALLORY is boarding in Connecticut. ATE RE 8 is farming his plantation in Georgia. SaxD sas, TUCKER, and THOMPSON still stay the balmy climate of Canada. LEE is teaching school, as President of Washington College. JOHNSTON is rebuilding the Danville Railroad, of which he is Superintendent. PEMBERTON is farming in the western part of the Old Dominion. DICK TAYLOR has leased a canal in Louisiana, and is employed in the transportation of flat-bottomed boats. FORREST is raising corn on a plantation in West Tennessee. Such is the business of each of the leaders who were successful in their peculiar line. The other class, those who falled so egregiously as Rebels, have adopted a more heroic line of characters, and are endeavoring to play CorioLanus, after their failure to succeed as CATALINE. Among these we have Junal Early, who acts as an officer of MAXIMILIAN; PRICE, who leads a guerilla band of fugitive Confederates in the provinces of Northern Mexico; KIBBY SMITH, who issues manifestoes, but appears to have no troops, and men of like stamp.

And so they are all disposed of: The giants who, in the days of war, were looked upon with interest and watched with anxiety, are now powerless, have fallen from their high estate, and are lower even than those who feared them. One turn of the wheel has levelled their position. Whether they will rise depends rather on themselves than on fate. The great clemency of our Government has reinstated them in their right to rise, if rise they can. The power of treason, broken and deformed, is well typified by the condition of its leaders. The cause of law has triumphed, and with its return has come destruction to all those whose ambition was too great to live as subjects.

Thus ever did rebellion find rebuke, Rebeliion in this land shall lose its sway, Meeting the check of such another day, And since this business so far fair is done, Let us not leave till all our own be won.'
