Solaces for the Summer Solstice.

Everybody goes to the country sometime during the summer season, to breathe the pure air and partake of all other healthful enjoyment. We will suppose the voyageur pour la hygiene to be travelling southward to-day or to-morrow. He proceeds at once to Baltimore and Washington, thence down the Potomac river and Chesapeake Bay to Hampton Roads, where, if the water be "choppy," he will get enough of "qualms" to relieve his system of any surplus bile, and landing at Old Point Comfort, he can examine the only fortress in the United States, and possibly catch a glimpse of Jeff. Davis. Now moving over to Norfolk, the tourist can view a bay where all the ships of the world can ride safely at anchor, and on the shores of which at some future day will arise a great and populous city, trading with every nation.

Taking one of the beautiful steamboats of the Baltimore bay line, a comfortable five hours' run takes us up the noble James river to Richmond. On the way we obtain a view of old Jamestown, Fort Powhatan, Merchants' Hope Church (oldest in the United States), Harrison's Landing, City Point, Drury's Bluff, &c. After visiting the historic grounds around Richmond and Petersburg, we move west by the Central Virginia Railroad to Lynchburg, and thence by easy stages to Lexington, where we see the Natural Bridge, and enjoy the pure atmosphere and beautiful scenery of the Blue Ridge Mountains.

Here, too, we can witness the evolutions of the Cadets of the Virginia Military Institute, under the superintendence of General F. H. Smith ("Old Specs"). "Stonewall" Jackson was formerly a professor in this institution. We may also see General R. E. Lee, the President of Washington College, and then proceed north to the Red, White, Blue, and Hot Sulphur Springs, where all of the Southern aristocrats "most do congregate," especially those who can never recognize gentility in a tailor, even though he be the President of the United States. Such a trip as we have here mapped out cannot fail to be pleasant and profitable.
