Now for the French: -D'ailleurs aucune loi n'a ete promulguee, aucune proposition soumise a la sanction du peuple; tout ce qui a ele fail sans le peuple est illegitime.' Here for the first time in 'history' we have an radication of the genuine 'history' we have an indication of the genuine Franch pieciscile. Not one word of the phrase we have put in italics, it will be observed, is in the original; but by a most ingenious device the simple reader is induced to believe that Caesar actually announced this modern theory in words which were borrowed from him by the first Na-poleon on his return from Elba, to which event we are quictly retered in a note. Cheero, again, is made to divide Roman society into the party of honest men and the party of villating, just as of honest men and the party of villains, just as now every honest man in France is, as we know, an imperialist. But what Cicero did say was precisely what General Peel said lately in the House, that, politically speaking. 'all men are liars.' 'Ego quos tu bonos esse dicas,' writes Cicero to Atticus, 'non intelligo; ipse nullos novi; sed its, si orgines bonorum querimus nam singulares sunt boni viri. Verum in dissensionibus ordines bonorum et genera querenda sunt." The Emperor thus renders this impor ant sen-tence:- 'Qu'entendez vous par ces hommes du bon parti? Jen'en connais pas que je puisse nomme. J'en connais, si nous l'entendons de la classe entière des honnetes gens; car individuellement, dans le vrai sens du mot, ils sont rares; mais dans les dissensions civiles, c'est la cause des honnetes gens qu'il faut chercher ou il est.' The translation, in fact, is made directly to con-tradict the original. There is no such thing as an honest man in politics, say Cicero and the member for Huntington; though whether the gallant General would go on to denounce the Tories as a party, as Cicero goes on to denounce every class of Romans as classes, may perhaps be doubted. Such, at any rate, is the trust-worthiness of the Emperor of the French."

-Fourisen million gallons of Cochitnate water were used in Boston in June, 1865. The water in the lake is now six and a half inches below high-water mark, and the fishy smell which was troublesome a few years ago is be-ginning to be perceptible again.
