of the cargo. After this the steward, who had also absented himself, applied for his discharge, although the articles stated that he and the second mate had shipped for a voyage from New York to a lumber port in North America, thence to Liverpool and other foreign ports, and back to the United States. The captain told him that he could not give him more than one-third of his wages due up to the arrival in port, as that was the Consul's order, and the law of the United States prohibited that an officer or seaman could claim that amount, but did not state that the captain was liable to pay more.

On Saturday night Ristori will repeat "Elizabeth," and on Monday, Leah, the Forsaken, will be produced. ARGUMENT OF THE PLAY. The original tragedy of Phædra (Phædra, of Racine) was presented for the first time at the Theatre du Vaudeville, by the Royal Company, on Friday, January 1, 1777. The plot, to a considerable extent, appertains to the old Greek mythological drama, interwoven with supposititious and historical incidents. "Theseus," King of Athens, has a second wife, a young and noble one called "Hippolytus," and by his second wife, "Phædra," also a son, who, however, does not appear among the dramatic persons. "Theseus" is alone absent from his kingdom, and supposed to have given himself up to some new amount, is mourned as dead. In the meantime, "Phædra," conceives an unholy passion for her son-in-law, "Hippolytus," which she seeks in vain to conceal, and in the endeavor to crush out which she writes the gods, she persecutes him with relentless cruelty. He, being unaware of "Phædra's" fatal passion, attributes her persecutions to her jealous enmity to "Ariana," an Athenian princess held in bondage at his father's court, with whom he is deeply enamored, and who returns his love. There is, however, a fatal barrier to their union, on which is the enmity of both between their ancestors. Doubly tortured, "Hippolytus" determines to leave the spot, in the vain hope of finding oblivion and discovering if his father still lives, before departing, he desires to see "Phædra." The latter, being torn with passion, desires death to appease her anguish, and on the approach of "Theseus" in consequence of her determination to die, to conceal her shame and remove. At this moment "Phædra" learns that the death of "Theseus" is a certainty, and the people are discussing whether she ("Phædra"), her son, or "Ariana," then little better than a slave at the court, shall be his successor. Prior to his departure, "Hippolytus," in an interview with "Ariana," confesses his love, and warns her of the dangers which surround her. "Phædra," in an interview with "Hippolytus," believing "Theseus" dead, reveals to him the reasons of her apparent hate and confesses that he is the object of her adoration. Perceiving that he does not reciprocate her passion, she desires death at his hands, and on his refusal she snatches his sword from him, but is hurried departing away by "Theseus."

What are the American Consul's Powers? Sir Captain G. J. Bishop, master of the ship T. J. Southard, of Richmond, Maine, U. S., having gone to sea under protest of the American Consul at this port, I should feel obliged by your giving publicity to the following statement of the captain, which may be of use to those masters and merchants who do not understand the exact reading of the law of the United States, a master has no power to disrate an officer or seaman for an absence of twenty-four hours without leave. For twenty-four hours absence, without leave, an officer or seaman forfeits all wages, goods and chattels. In some instances three days' pay is deducted for every day's absence of the full twenty-four hours being forfeited, all wages, goods and chattels. In some instances three days' pay is deducted for every day's absence of the full twenty-four hours being forfeited, all wages, goods and chattels. The facts in connection with the T. J. Southard are these:—When the ship arrived in Liverpool laden with wheat, Mr. and was placed in a berth for discharge, the captain ordered the chief mate to see that the crew assisted in landing the cargo, and that the second mate superintended and assisted them. The second mate obeyed the Consul sent for the captain, who made a statement at his office. The Consul then ordered the log-book to be produced, and the book having been forwarded, nothing more transpired for a few days, and the second mate absented himself from the ship. The captain afterwards had occasion to go to the Consul's office, and the Consul then told him that he would have to pay three months' wages extra for the second mate on account of putting him to superintend and assist in the discharging
