

LITERATURE
VIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

THE GIRAFFE HUNTERS. By Captain Mayne Reid. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. Probably no writer possesses the power of captivizing the fancies of boys like Reid. He has a fertile imagination, a good knowledge of natural history, and writes in a style which is calculated to interest. There is none of the sentimentality which abounds in many of his works. All is life, and tends to encourage daring and healthy exercise. We therefore hail with pleasure the appearance of another book from his hands. He has given us, we had thought, a separate set of hunters for every living beast; but we see the Giraffe was overlooked, and with this long-necked game we are for the first time made acquainted by the pleasant volume now before us. We speak for it the popularity of its predecessors.

A QUIET NEIGHBORHOOD. By George Macdonald. New York: Harper & Bro.; Philadelphia Agents: J. B. Lippincott & Co. In a very quiet neighborhood must have been the life of the writer. The story is a quiet one. All the people are quiet people; the very animals throughout the tale are quiet animals; yet with all this silence and peace, the story is not insipid. It is interesting, and although without great dramatic power, is none the less of sufficient plot to keep the interest of the reader alive, and repay a perusal of the work. We never came across any of Macdonald's works before, although a list is placed on the title page, but we judge he is some improvement on the placidity of Trollope, without, however, the power of description which the latter possesses. "A Quiet Neighborhood" ends well, and is not destitute of force. It is written in the autobiographic style.

LIZZIE LISTON OF GREYBROOK. By E. Lyon Linton. American News Company: New York. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. Lizzie Liston is an old maid, at least an unmarried lady of thirty-five, who is beaten and trampled upon, metaphorically by her family, slighted by her neighbors, as nobody in the world. She is just such a character as Trollope has painted a score of times. Suddenly a distant relative—how novelists must bless the existence of distant relatives!—dies, and Lizzie is an heiress. With equal rapidity she changes her place in the family and in the social scale. A fine melo-dramatic effect is produced, culminating in a trial, and terminating in the accidental drowning of Lizzie. The work is above the medium order, and the character of Lizzie is well drawn, but rather too sharply for truth to nature.

MILLCENT LEIGH is the title of a pleasant little child's book issued by J. P. Kelley, in this city. The same publisher has of late added largely to the list of children's literature, and all he publishes is pure and interesting. His works are all well fitted for Sunday School libraries.

NEW BOOK BY A PHILADELPHIA POET.—A. Watson Atwood, Esq., of this city, is busily engaged on a work to be published in 1867, entitled "Idylls of the Night." It is written in the popular style of Benjamin F. Taylor's "January and June," which has obtained a world-wide reputation. This will be Mr. Atwood's first work.

AN INTERESTING HISTORICAL CONTROVERSY. It was expected by not a few that some of the allusions in the last volume of Mr. Bancroft's "History of the United States" to the military career and conduct of General Greene would be the occasion of controversy. This was especially deemed probable in view of the fact that a living representative of General Greene—Professor G. W. Greene—in himself, a thorough historical scholar and a writer of ability. Mr. Bancroft's allusions to General Greene were more in the nature of indirect derogations from either his ability or patriotism than direct charges, but unquestionably left on the minds of his readers a decidedly unfavorable impression, which Professor Greene has sought to remove by a pamphlet just published by Ticknor & Fields. He arrays a large number of proofs in support of the following propositions: 1. That the assertion that Greene was depicted in 1776 is not only unfounded, but completely at variance with the general tone of his letters at that period, and even with those upon which the charge is founded. 2. That Greene's account of the affair at Kip's Bay contains no "reflection" upon Washington. 3. That the manner in which the attempt upon Staten Island is related, conveys, by the suppression of an important fact, a false idea of Greene.

that a phrase which actually occurs in a letter to Madison forms part of a letter to Washington. Greene expressly declares that he did not believe for independence could be held. The Commissioned-in-Chief ever step to the pen on the 11th of November, Washington himself believes that post. Greene, it is held, that the question of independence was referred to Greene on the 11th of November, because he was on the spot. That on the 11th, Washington, by coming on the spot became the responsible officer. That it is the success of the retreat from Long Island can be taken as a test, the troops might have been routed by Greene, as an example of the day, and the morning of the 16th, when the attack began. And that, in fact, an English officer who wrote a history of the army, expressly blames Washington for not following the advice given after the investment begun.
