

tration was secretly hailed with joy by every black man in the land.

They also watched with eager gaze the firm stand taken by the Republicans of the North.

When President Lincoln called for the first 75,000 men, after the attack upon Sumter, colored men were among the foremost to come forward and offer their services to assist in putting down the Rebellion.

The Copperhead press exulted in its resources to prove that the colored man would not fight, even if an opportunity were given them. Refused admission into the army, not allowed to raise a hand in behalf of the Union, and our army was to be composed of white men alone, without a policy, the President called for more troops, and the railroads and steamboats were crowded—men responding to the call, and yet we met with no success.

The Confederacy, thousands of brave men had died fighting for the Union.

At the battle of Bull Run, Peninsula, Belmont, Big Bethel, and Ball's Bluff, the black man distinguished himself by his valor and his heroism had attracted honorable attention.

At the battle of Bull Run, when the Captain of one of the Rhode Island batteries had been killed, James Redder, a colored man, sprang to the gun, and worked it as expertly as the white men.

Another bondman for himself came into the Union lines on the banks of the Mississippi river, and they called him "Black Tom." He follows the army in the long march, a soldier dies by the roadside, and he is buried.

When a white man is killed, he is buried with honors, and the next battle does good service for the Federal cause.

Capt. Francis. They had tied the steward in the cabin, after being hailed by the gunboat, and showing the Stars and Stripes, and representing that it was a Union vessel.
