

FROM EUROPE BY STEAMER. NAPOLEON'S SPEECH.

Opening of the Session of the French Legislature—Scene in the Chamber—Arrival and Reception of the Emperor and Empress, &c.

From Gallipoli's Messenger, Feb. 15—Evening. The legislative session of 1867 was opened this day at 1 o'clock by the Emperor in person, the ceremony taking place, as on preceding occasions, in the Salle des Etats of the Louvre.

As the weather was delightful, and mutually kind for the season of the year, a considerable crowd had assembled on the place to witness their Majesty's passage. As is usual on such occasions, a party of the National Guards on one side and a detachment of the other were posted along the way which the Imperial cortege had to follow.

The internal arrangements of the Salle des Etats were about the same as in the preceding years, by which the large and ornate velvet, or damasked with gold lace. Hangings, and other more rich material were to be seen in the windows and doorways, and the front of the long galleries running down the whole length of the hall was similarly adorned.

The first arrivals, contrary to what was seen in former years, took place long before the usual hour, and at half past seven, the highly privileged, there was no possibility for any person to get more than a casual glance into the grand hall of meeting.

A great number of elegantly dressed ladies also continued to present themselves, and generally were assigned places in the galleries in front of the Emperor and Empress, and on each side was occupied exclusively by the fair spectators, the bright colors of their spring dresses adding to the general effect.

At present, after fifteen years of calm and prosperity, the nation has been called upon to re-organize itself, and to re-constitute its institutions. Every year you expressed to me a desire for such a course; but, convinced with reason that progress is only accomplished by herculean efforts, and by the sacrifice of the present to the future, I have placed in me, and I thank you for it, your confidence to decide on the moment when I should believe in the possibility of realizing your views.

The moment the Emperor appeared, loud cries of Vive l'Empereur burst forth, and continued until his Majesty had taken his seat on the throne. The young Prince sat close by, and the other Princes occupied the chairs of state adjoining.

The Grand Master of the Ceremonies then signified to all to be seated, and his Majesty, who looked in excellent health, rising, delivered in a distinct voice, heard in every part of the hall, the following speech.

uneasiness in a country like our own, all parts of which, irrevocably linked together, form a common destiny, have immediately followed its usage, and the nation has preferred limiting the exercise of its rights to submitting to disorder in ideas as in things. It is worthy of you and me to make a larger application of those great principles which are the glory of France; and their development will not compromise, as formerly, the necessary prestige of authority.

The Government is at present founded; and its organs—the only obstacles to the extension of our liberties—will be extinguished in the immensity of universal suffrage. I have full confidence in the good sense and patriotism of the people and strong in my right, which I hold from them—strong in my conscience, which only desires to see the nation to advance with me with an assured step in the path of civilization.

When the applause had subsided the Grand Master of Ceremonies, having taken the orders of his Majesty, intimated to M. Boucher, Minister of State, that the oath was to be administered to the Senators and members of the Legislative Body as had been nominated since the last session. That act having been gone through, the honorable President declared that the session of 1867 was open, and he requested the members of the two Chambers to assemble next day in their respective places of sitting for the despatch of business.

Arrest of a Postmaster Charged with Opening Letters—Modest Request of a Suspicious Correspondent—Apparent Simplicity of the Accused, &c. Yesterday afternoon F. W. Parsons, Postmaster at Niagara Falls, was arrested by B. K. Sharrett, Special Detective in the Post Office Department, charged with opening letters received at his office.

Commodore Meade, brother of Major-General Meade, has a suit against the Government in the Court of Claims for $1,000,000, as administrator of his father, Richard W. Meade. It appears that the father of the Commodore was killed during the Peninsular war, under Napoleon, and entered into various contracts with the Spanish Government, by which means Spain became largely his debtor.

From the Independent. It is with great joy that the people of the North see the sword of a military government unsheathed by Congress over the rebellious States. Thank God that our dilatory representatives at last mean to provide against the perils of the situation by a courageous remedy.

Death of a Famous Female Brigand. The Italia di Naples announces the death of the famous "brigandess," La Gizzi, who was for some time the terror of the Volturra district. La Gizzi was a tall, muscular woman, with black hair, and with thick, wavy, black, shaggy hair that fell over her shoulders and breast, and was so bloodthirsty that she involuntarily performed the office of executioner on every captive doomed to death by her band.

Population of European Turkey. In the Transactions of the Austrian Geographical Society for 1867, just published at Vienna, there is an article by Professor Gohlert on the Population of European Turkey. The author gives the population of European Turkey (excluding Roumania and Servia) at 10,000,000, of which 7,000,000 are Christians, and the rest Mohammedans, Turks, Albanians, Bulgarians, and Bosnians.

How an Earl Tried to Learn a Language and Failed. The Pall Mall Gazette has this sharp paragraph:—"Earl St. Maur, who, seven years ago, took up his abode in Albania to learn its language and regenerate the people, and who writes with the same benevolent views towards the Moors. We take this from the Court Journal, a paper which is obviously worth nothing if it does not tell us really new and true things about earls and their goings on. But Earl St. Maur regenerate the Albanian people, and learn their language? We are assured by a gentleman well versed in Turkish affairs, whose position gives weight to what he says—we hope we may be allowed to borrow the predatory words with which an evening contemporary has just been promulgating as surprising a mess of news about Turkish politics as ever was honored with big print—that Albania is still in a state of anarchy, and therefore has not been regenerated. As for the language, we happen to know that his lordship broke down at the forty-seventh letter of the Albanian alphabet, which is described by Colonel Leake as resembling the Greek, but having a more ponderous sound, thrown upwards towards the nostrils. His friends do not seem to have the vowel-sounds of unregenerate hill tribes thrown against his ears, but he is sure, he would have done later had he got on as far as the irregular verbs, which are very trying. As for the Moors, we sincerely trust he will never come across a copy of Professor Newman's Arabic Grammar, which he would value the retention of his wits—unless he treats it as a picture-book, by reason of the professor's new characters, which are inverted crescents on poles, and such like. The elder children of Earl St. Maur, who have not yet been regenerated, and have done most things. But they have never had this sort of work assigned to them before; nor have we ever heard anything like it except an obscure rumor of another elder son who cultivated his Arabic at Paris, and died, and it by taking an old Rabbi into keeping, in order to read the Talmud with him."
