THE PARTY WYDNING THE MORESTED THE ADMINISTER MONDAY, JULY 1, 1861.

REBEL WAR HISTORY. THE BATTLES OF FREDERICKEBURG AND CHANCEL-LORSVILLE.

Benjamin G. Humphreys, late a Confederate General, has published an account of his "Be-collections of Fredericksburg." Towards the conclusion he sums up his views in regard to Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, as fol-

"The battle of Chancellorsville was fought "The battle of Chancellorsville was fought from Fredericksburg to the Wilderness along two almost parallel roads—the 'Plank Road' and the 'Old Turnpike'—and is justly regarded as one of the proudest achievements of Southern arms. Military critics are puzzled at its result. Lee knew with absolute certainty that Hooker had over 120,000 men. Hooker knew with equal certainty that Lee had less than 50,000. Hooker moved over 90,000 to Chancellorsville, and left Sedgwick, in front of Fredericksburg, with over moved over 90,000 to Chancellorsville, and left Sedgwick, in front of Fredericksburg, with over thirty thousand. Why did Sedgwick cross a portion of his army over the river at Deep run on the 29th of April? Was the movement premature, or was it made to threaten and hold Lee at Fredericksburg until Hooker could slip through the Wilderness, and fall upon the flank and rear of Lee's army? If so, why did Hooker halt at Chancellorsville, and commence fortifying on the 30th of April?

"After Lee moved up to Chancellorsville and confronted Hooker on 1st of May, why were Hooker and Sedgwick both inactive? They knew that Lee had divided his army. Hooker and Sedgwick each had an army—had they been Confederate soldiers—that could have vanquished either half of Lee's army, if that half had been any other but Confederate soldiers. Yet they both remained inactive until Jackson gained the extreme right flank of Hooker's army on the 2d, with fully half of Lee's army, and drove back the right wing of Hooker's army upon the centre. Then sedgwick began to move in earnest, on the 3d of May, and Hooker remained on the defensive with his ninely thousand against forty-five thousand. and Hooker remained on the defensive with his ninely thousand against forty-five thousand. From the number of men that Hooker knew Jackson had on his right flank, stirring up his Dutch, he must have known that Lee had but few lett between him and Sedgwick. Tet Hooker remained, defending his ninety thousand as best he could against Anderson's twelve thousand and Jackson's twenty-five thousand, and let Lee turn towards Fredericksburg, with two divisions—eight thousand men the 4th of May and in hearing distance of -on the 4th of May, and in hearing distance of Hooker, drive Sedgwick, with his twenty thousand, across the Rappahanock; and on the 5th became alarmed for the safety of his ninety-thousand, and precipitately recrossed the river. That didn't look to the Rebels like 'pulverizing the relation's much be safety.

"Had Hooker been a Lee, and Sedgwick a Jackson, Sedgwick would have moved out from Deep run with his thirty thousand aguars across the plateau between Barksdale and Early during the night of 1st of May, and presented himself on the hills on the Mine road. General Early would have been captured or routed back to North Anna—Barksdale would have evacuated Mayre Hill, and perhaps made his escape to the 'plank road' and gained Lee—and Jackson would not have made his flank movement to Hooker's right flank. Still, then, nothing but action on the part of both Hooker and Sedgwick would have prevailed. It Hooker had prudently remained at Chancellorsville defending his ninety thousand men against half of Lee's aimy, now reduced by the loss of Early, Stonewall Jackson would have turned upon Sedgwick with the other half of Lee's army, and pushed him back across his pontoons at Fredericksburg, and returned towards Chancellorsville and struck Hooker on his left flank and drove in his left wing upon his centre, and Lee would have pushed the whole disordered mass through the Wilderness and across the Rapidan. But if Hooker had been a Johnson or a Longstreet on the morning of the 2d of May, with ninety thou-sand men at Chancellorsville, and had Sedgwick been a Beauregard, D. H. Hill, or a Hood, with thirty thousand men on the hills back of Fredericksburg, a joint, active, closing-in movement would have been made upon Lee, and Lee would have been crushed upon the plank road, and that would have looked like 'pulverizing the Rebellion.' But the supposed Sedgwick—Beauregard—Hill—Hood—was not the real Stonewall Jackson, and the supposed Hooker— Johnston-Longstreet—was not the real Robert E. Lee. Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson knew their men."

THE SIEGE OF TROY.

[Not from Advance Sheets of the Tribune.] [Not from Advance Sheets of the Tribune.]
With a great sweep of my pen-arm, I hurl
Troy and its mighty siege, bristing and bubbling, into the midst of Printing House Square.
Rattle and thunder, ye mighty presses, and with the clatter of your Hadean forms awaken to consciousness the shades of departed heroes, their ambrosial locks still spermy with the froth of their golden glory.

Be satisfied and rejoice, O Tribune, for I am here—here alone, ready to inform you first, of this wairling sphere, that Troy has fallen!!!!

Mighty Hector died ere the ligneous Pegasus betrayed the magnanimous Trojans, and admitted the crafty Greeks to the radiant recesses of the sacred city.

betrayed the magnanimous Trojans, and admitted the crafty Greeks to the radiant recesses of the sacred city.

Hector died in my arms.

When his huge soul was about to burst against the weeping stars, he said, "George, you are a wonderful fellow!!"

Then exploded the spirit of the already apotheosized warrior; and the heavens shook like a bowl of jelly on a Western steamboat, and all nature heaved like a Hyperborean sea.

Huzzah! you should have seen the dreadful fight. Like the tempest-riven aky the flerce foes rushed together. They ate each others flery hearts in the flerce contest as black worms eat out the hearts of fragrant roses in June. They crawled mountains high upon each other until the citadel was dwarfed, and writhed like Laocoons struggling with a million serpents. It was dreadful! It was horrible!!

It was sublime!!!

It was sublime!!!

While all the plain crawled and groaned with the desperate battle, and blood shot out from myriads of breasts, as red leaves in the autumn of a new-born world, with mighty stride did mighty Ajax come, his huge embossed shield Metore him dark and frowning, as a sable mountain, his heard shivering with the eternities of the hour.

Ajax saw me and spoke in a voice of thunder:

the hour.

Ajax saw me and spoke in a voice of thunder:

"G. A. T.—We've get 'em. Minerva huris her divine helmet against the acorn; and Mars drives the trojans bellowing bellicosely beyond the foaming Scamander. Andres Athenatoi, it's all right! Let's drink, George, as we did when I sought to listen to your poem in the Central Park, and fell asleep over the sweetness of its rhythm."

Park, and fell asleep over the sweetness of its rhythm."

A mighty billow bore Ajax from me, and drove me upon Diomede's surging host, fraught with slaughter, and yellow with the dust of the sky-darkening scene.

"You here?" asked Diomede. "But I knew you would be. I have read the New York papers and seen what the lesser weeklies have said about you. Do justice to this, George. It's a big thing (I give an exact translation from the Athenian, which I spoke fluently from my cradle), depend upon it. The Flates are driving the enemy down into the Tartarus of despair; and the Furles lash him with thongs torn from the groves of dreadful Dodona."

Troy is burning. The city flames luridly, as if the sun had shot into every window, and run through and through the splendid streets in molten rivers of crimson and gold.

The fire licks, and crawls, and winds itself about the sacred temples like a curious snake born of the throes of Nature, and crushing a Baphometic-babtized sphere.
