

CURIOSITIES OF PRINT COLLECTIONS.

A writer in the Cornhill, noticing the unprecedented price of $6000 paid for an etching by Rembrandt at a public sale in London in February last, adds some curious particulars of remarkable collections:—

A STORY OF REMBRANDT. About one of Rembrandt's etchings we have an amusing story. He had come to spend a day with his great friend, Jan Six, a burgo-master of Amsterdam. As they were sitting down to dinner it was found the servant had forgotten to provide any mustard. He was sent off to the village to get some of the Dutch kind, knowing that "much haste, little speed," laid a wager with the burgo-master that he would catch the view from the dining-room window before the servant returned. He sketched the view, and won his bet. The engraving is a very rare one. Baron Versteke's impression sold for £17 10s.; but he would be fortunate who could secure a good impression at that price now.

DURER. Of Albert Durer's etchings the most beautiful is his "Adam and Eve." Some time ago the best known impression of this engraving came into the possession of Mr. Smith, the eminent print-seller. He showed the print to Mr. Maberly, who eagerly inquired the price—which, as far as I recollect, was about sixty pounds sterling. Possessing another impression already, Mr. Maberly was at first not inclined to pay this large sum even for such superior excellence. Day after day, however, he came to look at the charming impression, and at last said, "Well, well, I must have it. But you will take back any other impression, won't you, and allow me what I paid for it—£15?" "Why, no," said Mr. Smith. "I don't think that I can do that. I won't offer you £15, but if you like, I will give you £50." The value of the engraving had been doubled since Mr. Maberly's former purchase. At Mr. Maberly's death his prize sold for £55. Mr. Johnson's impression, which was no doubt, a fine one, brought £40. What a change from the price Durer himself tells us he got for his engraving in 1530—four shillings (fourpence)! Even taking into account the difference in the value of money in his time and our own, what he received cannot have amounted to a couple of shillings.

MULLER. F. Muller's engraving of "Madonna di San Sisto" proved his death. On taking a proof of his plate to the publisher by whom he was employed, he was told he must go over the whole work again, as it was far too delicate for commercial purposes. With heavy heart he set about his work, but it was too much for him, and on the very day the proofs were taken off from the retouched plate, he died. It fetches large prices now. At Mr. Johnson's sale, a "fine proof before any letters" brought one hundred and twenty pounds. The same was obtained for Count Archinto's copy in 1862.

CONTRAST OF PRICES. In comparing the ancient prices of prints on their first publication with the modern ones—I have already mentioned Durer's "Adam and Eve," and Mr. Maberly tells us that Durer purchased Lucas Kræmer's "Eisen-spiegel," now worth, when in good state, £60, for a shilling—must not forget the immensely larger sums that engravers are paid now-a-days than what were usual in former times. The artist then was often his own publisher; but even when he was engaged by some other person, he received what would be considered at present most inadequate remuneration. Woollett, for instance, a hundred years ago, asked only fifty guineas for engraving his "Niobe," though Alderman Boydell generously gave him one hundred guineas, at which it was published, was five shillings, no difference being made between proofs and prints—the subscribers being allowed to take which they pleased. Contrast these prices with those that are now asked for the same work. We will take an instance from France. Louis XIV commenced a "Chalcographie du Musée Royale," a series of engravings from pictures in the Louvre. The series is still continuing, and in 1854 the sum voted for this purpose was nearly £900,000. Of this H. Dapont was to receive £1666 for engraving Paul Veronese's "Pilgrims of Emmaus," and De Francois (the artist engaged for Fra Angelico's "Coronation of the Virgin." When in 1847 there was a similar commission contemplated by the English Government, it was said that the sum Mr. J. H. Robinson was to receive for engraving "The Raising of Lazarus" was £2000. A publisher will often spend several thousand pounds in bringing out a first-class engraving. The "copyright" alone is a most serious item. Landseer got for the "Peace and War," now in the Vernon Gallery, £2600. The price charged for the impressions must of course be in proportion. For instance, when Colnaghi published Deo's engraving of the "Raising of Lazarus," there were 100 artists' proofs at 20 guineas, 100 proofs on India paper at 15 guineas, 100 proofs on plain paper at 10 guineas, 200 prints on India paper at 6 guineas, whilst the prints themselves were charged 5 guineas each.

The same writer says:—The subject of engraving leads us naturally to the sister subject of painting. No collecting mania is anything like so popular or so extensively practised as that for pictures. They have come to be considered as indispensable articles of furniture in every well-appointed house; and it is no uncommon thing, in consequence, to meet with a collector who talks and evidently thinks much less of the gems that ornament his gallery than of the checks by which they were secured. And how grossly the "old masters" are belied in many of these collections! They had no more to do with the productions to which their names are appended in all the splendor that gilt letters can give them than the purchaser himself. But if a man will order a Claude five feet by three and a half, because he has a spare corner of those dimensions, he had better not inquire too closely, any more than in the case of a St. Anthony's tooth, as to what animal it originally belonged. In London alone there are, I suppose, sold every year more pictures by the "old masters" than are left to us of their paintings altogether. Let me mention two facts. In the year 1845 the number of pictures imported into England amounted, according to the returns of the Custom House, to 14,091. In one month of the same year there were sold by auction in London alone, with out reckoning those included in furniture sales, about the number of these must have been considerable, 4617.

The difference between the prices at which such pictures are acquired and those they fetch when brought to the hammer, is amusing. A picture, declared in a catalogue to have cost its late owner 1000 guineas, sells at £371! A Yorkshire gentleman bequeathed twelve of his pictures to the National Gallery; they are rejected, every one. The whole collection is brought to the hammer; it had cost £2000; it produces £150—about the value of the frames. Nor is it only in England that a man sells a horse for a gross of green spectacles. A French collector, insured as his gallery for £339,500 francs. It is sold some years after wards, but some additions having meantime been made to it, for 585,436 francs. And one cannot imagine in these cases that there is any such possible explanation in the case of the Earl of Suffolk's ten pictures—"Guido's 'Ecce Homo' amongst them—that were stolen so mysteriously from Charlton Park in October, 1856, and not recovered till the early part of 1858, when some of them had been hanging in a small public house and an old picture-shop, but failed to meet with purchasers, as they were considered such very inferior productions!
