MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

Lotta as "Fire-fly." It is scarcely to be wondered at that the ively little actress now performing at the Arch should be popular. She is so pretty and childish ooking, so vivacious, so kittenish in all her ways, that she carries the sympathies of her audience with her, in spite of the fact that her capers cannot properly be considered as acting in any acknowledged sense of the word. Lotta's strong point is kicking her heels, and when she kicks her heels she always brings down the house. What would be vulgar in another actress is in her case laughabte and amusing; she cas smoke a clear, play on the banjo, beat the drum. dance a breakdown, sing a little, and is proficient in divers other accomplishments too numerous to mention, but when it comes to stamping one of her red-laced boots on the stage with an air of command or defiance, or cutting a pigeon wing. which she does some dozen or two times, more or less, in every act, she is in her glory, an t her audience is happy. The question might rea onably be asked. Why should this gay, dashing little woman trouble herself about art, when she is sure of pleasing the public and filling the theatre night after night with the nonsensical antics she is such a perfect mistress of? And yet we would like to see Lotta seriously attempt some good part, and play it as well as she is able, for we believe that she has capabili ties which as yet are undeveloped, and we do not believe that her popularity would be dimin ished in the least if she would endeavor to do something really artistic.

Mr. Edmund Falconer's drama of Fire-fly which was produced last night, is an adaptation of "Ouida's" novel of "Under Two Flags," and we have sufficiently characterized it when we say that the play is every way as absurd as the story. The dramatist, however, has accomplished his object in giving Lotta a part in which she has ample opportunities to show off her peculiar fascinations, and which keeps her almost constantly before the audience. The plot is very slight, and not very important, although the dramatist has managed to stretch out to five acts what might easily have been told in three at the most. An English gentleman of noble family, "Harold Cecil," is unjustly suspected of the crime of forgery, and to escape from disgrace he leaves his own country and goes to Algiers, where he enlists as a private in the French army. For some reason, not clearly explained. he manages to incur the hatred of the colonel of his regiment, and he also wlus the affections of "Fire fly," the vivandiere. "Harold," however, loves a noble English lady, who discovers him in his disguise, and as she reciprocates his affection, the poor little vivandiere, of course, is in a very bad way about it. "Harold" falls into a trap set for him by the "Colonel," and is sentenced to be shot for a breach of discipline: and "Fire-fly" exerts himself to save him and obtains a pardon. She arrives with the important document just as "Harold" is about to be executed, and throw, herself between him and the muskets levelled at his breast. She receives the bullets in her own heart, and dies at his feet. This tragic ending, to our mind, spoils the piece, and we think it would be more satisfactory, and every way as effective, if "Fire-fly" could be permitted to save her own life and her friend's, too, by a very slight alteration in the denouement of the piece.

The play, in spite of its faults, is lively, with plenty of action and any amount of broadsword combats, musketry discharges, and other exciting incidents of like character. Some of the tableaux are very effective, and as it is well acted and well placed upon the stage it goes off with much spirit and amid the heartiest applause. The house was crowded to its utmost capacity last evening, and the performance was a decided success, inasmuch as everybody seemed pleased, Lotta's performance did not present any new features, and as "Fire-fly" she was essentially the same as she is in everything else. In the sentimental passages she did not appear to the same advantage as she did in those where she could give a free rein to her spirit of fun and frolic, just as her "Little Nell" is inferior to her "Marchioness." The last named she could make a really fine part if she would study Dickens, try to act it, and try to forget Lotta. That she will do this, and endeaver to made an artist of herself, we doubt; but we do not doubt that she would advance her reputation thereby, and make her performances every way more worthy of applause. The elfish creation of Dickens is in every way suited to her abilities, and it is worthy of her best efforts. Mr. Brougham's dramatization, however, is not the best that might be made, and not the least of its faults is that it encourages, rather than restrains, Lotta's extravagances. We feel a sincere interest in this little actress, and we say thus much because we would like to have her make her mark in a way that would entitle her to the best praises we have to bestow.

E. L. Davenport as "Hamlet." Mr. E. L. Davenport received a very cordial welcome at the Walnut Street Theatre last evening, and he gave an unusually fine personation of "Hamlet." Mr. Davenport is certainly one of the most versatile and accomplished actors on the American stage. In tragedy, comedy, and melo-drama he is equally at home, and whatever character he undertakes he gives it an individuality which marks it as a work of refined and intellectual art. We have been astonished at times to see how Mr. Davenport will sink his own individuslity, and become absorbed in the character he undertakes to represent, and appearing as he does sometimes in two entirely different roles in the same evening, he contrives to change his whole personal appearance and facial expres. sion so as to sink the actor completely. There are some performers on the stage who have this power in a limited degree, and in one or two parts they are pre-eminent; but with Mr. Davenport every role is elaborated with the same conscientious fidelity, and in the particular point we have named we think that he is without a rival.

Mr. Davenport's "Hamlet" we have seen many times, and always with pleasure, and, without disparaging the merits of other actors who have gained celebrity in the same role, we have always been inclined to give it a very high place in our regards as an artistic, scholarly, and satisfactory representation of the most subtle and difficult rote that can be taken up by a first-class actor. There is a sustained excelence 'about Mr. Davenport's "Hamlet" that commends it to the dramatic connoisseur as well is the Shakespearian student, and as an interretation of the hidden meaning of the tragedy exhibition, and in their particular line they are unrivalled by any performers now before the Ameerican public. The ease and grace with which their feats of skill and daring are executed obviate the idea of danger in the minds of the audience, and even in the most perilous acts we feel certain that the performers will come safely to their feet again. The Russian athlete Pfau's trapeze performances are wonderful. and the boys Victor, Julian, and Francois are also interesting. One of the new features of the entertainment is the velocipede evolutions of William and Frederic Hanlon. These vehicles are all the rage now in Paris, and there is some talk about introducing them in this country. The Hanlors show how they are managed, but we are afraid that amateur ventures in the same way would result in numerous overturns before the same skill could be acquired. The entertainment is agreeably varied by the musical performances of Miss Emily Thorne, balladist, Mr. James Biamphin, harpist, and Mr. A. B. sedgwick, concertina player.
