Even-handed Justice.

It requires no small stretch of fancy to detect the resemblance between Justice as administered in these modern days and her allegorical representative, the blindfolded goddess with scales, who dealt evenly with all. It may have been that in the days when Cicero practiced law the analogy was apparent, but certain it is that the scales at present must be nicely balanced with gold in order that the same exertions should be made by certain lawyers for a client. The trial of the man Twitchell is the best evidence of how money can secure a defense which poverty could not attempt. We feel no hesitation in speaking frankly in this case, as there is no danger of anything we may say influencing in the least the final result. The twelve men on whom the decision of the question depends are closely looked up and guarded from the sight of any newspaper, and their judgment or their prejudice cannot be changed by any word of ours. The defense has been a desperate one. No pettifoggery, no objection, technical or material, no effort to bias the jury's mind, has been spared by the prisoner's counsel. Those who have read the trial cannot fail to note that an entirely different object has been had in view than the securing of a true statement of the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. That seems to have been lost sight of by the defendant's counsel. They have sought to clear their client by fair means or through the concealment of truth. Instead of acting as though they were convinced of the innocence of their client, they have betrayed a constant desire to cover up circumstances, and not to give the whole truth to the court. Now, if the theory be correct that the object of a lawyer is to succeed, and that he owes no duty to the court or the community, then is he justified in resorting to every artifice to cheat justice of her due, provided he receives a sufficiently large fee. But we cannot believe that such is the real attitude which the member of the bar should bear to the court. He is its sworn officer. He takes an oath to do what? To merely be faithful to his client? No. To be faithful to both the court and his client. And further, "Not to delay the ends of justice for lucre or malice." Is it in conformity with that oath that he resorts to every means to secure delay, to exclude facts, and to prejudice the jury? We think not; and believe that, whatever may be the opinion of some, the great mass of lawyers unite in holding that the ends of justice are the first which call him, as a sworn officer of the law, to seek to find. Yet, with all the resorts to desperate efforts, the defense of Twitchell has not succeeded in breaking the fearful link of circumstantial evidence with which he is surrounded. It stands there, each link a trifle, but all united in a chain which Hercules could not free himself from with all his strength. Whatever doubt may have been felt over the question of guilt or innocence of the accused, it received a destructive shock in the testimony of Dr. Levis. The blood upon the shirt, even had he been wearing it at the time he carried the body in, could not have come from contact with the corpse. It was sprinkled blood, which must have stained the linen when it spouted out from some object. When it did so, and what was the object from which it came, and what caused it to come in that manner, cause fearful inferences to be drawn. Yet with all this, the defense seeks an acquittal by proving good character previous to the murder. What does general reputation amount to in contradiction to crime perpetrated? Did not Dr. Webster of Boston stand irrefragable in the eyes of the world, and did his character save him, or was he unjustly treated? No, against one such event outward appearances avail not a straw's weight. It has been argued that a man cannot be hung on circumstantial evidence. It is a usual thing in our Oyer and Terminer. It seems to us, not many months since, with a haste admitting of no delay, a cripple and a fanatic were led to the gallows for murdering two old women. What was the character of the evidence on which Winmore and Gottlieb Williams were hung? Did any one see them do the deed? Did any motive adequate to it appear at the trial? Was the absence of motive a good defense? No. One was hung for murdering a woman who had always treated him kindly, and by whose death he could only be a looser; the other for killing another old woman to get possession of two dollars. These were all the motives assigned. No one saw either do the deed. The door of the house was opened by Winmore, and he was found alone with the murdered woman. On that evidence he was hung. Is there no similarity between the two cases? The door of the house corner of Tenth and Pine is opened by Twitchell, and he found alone in the house with his wife and the murdered woman. An object in her death is plainly shown. The possession of $20,000 worth of property is the goal sought to be arrived at. Yet one was hung through the exertions of the very counsel who now declares that circumstantial evidence should not hang the other. We do not say that Winmore was not guilty, although we always had serious doubts on the subject; but certainly, by a parity of reasoning, if circumstantial evidence be sufficient to hang the one, the same kind of evidence should hold against the other in the same proportion of responsibility. Why is it that Winmore went to his death without a tithes of the straining of law and hunting up of objections which Twitchell secured by his gold? The one was not worth $10 in the world, the other is backed by $20,000 at least. Shall justice be dealt to them differently? We hope, we believe not. If the proof already given to connect Twitchell with the crime be not rebutted, an acquittal would be but a stimulus to other wealthy criminals, and would expose, not unjustly, the courts of justice to the remark that "money can murder with impunity, while poverty must swing for it." We favor the meting out to every one, be he a beggar or a millionaire, the same exact punishment or reward as the fabled goddess measured to all the world.

Monument Building. The idea of perpetuating the fame of our great men by means of "monumental brass and storied urn" has never found much favor in this country. When a prominent statesman or soldier dies—and sometimes before he is dead—there are always a number of enthusiastic admirers who rush before the public with their subscription papers for raising funds for a monument upon which may be recorded the story of his deeds of valor or patriotic services for the benefit of posterity. At first there is considerable enthusiasm manifested, and money comes in from all quarters with the most gratifying rapidity, but before the necessary amount is raised the interest in the scheme dies out, and the whole matter would be entirely forgotten if discontented subscribers who are anxious to have some return for their money did not write fraternal letters to the newspapers inquiring what had become of the funds. In fact, we are very much disposed to think that monument building is a pursuit for which the American people have no particular taste or inclination, and we also have our doubts with regard to the utility of monuments in this age of the printing press and telegraph.

If our great men cannot say with Horace, "Exegi monumentum ere perennis," they will scarcely be held in loving remembrance by their countrymen although marbles unnumerable were inscribed with their names and achievements. Monuments are the devices of a past and very different age from ours, and it is no sign that we do not reverence our heroic dead that we hesitate and delay over the various monumental projects that have been started for the purpose of doing them honor. It is in the highest degree discreditable, however, that so many half-finished works of this kind should be scattered all over the country, and before any new monuments are commenced, it is worth while to consider whether it would not be better to complete some of those that we have on hand.

Opposite to the President's House, in Washington, there is a square pillar, which a stranger might easily imagine was a ousin; ruin which we had inherited from a pre-historic age, but which a resident of the capital will inform us is the first half of a stupendous national monument to the Father of his Country. The corner-stones of this structure was laid some twenty years ago, and the work upon it progressed by slow degrees until the funds ran out, and nothing has been done upon it for half a score of years at least, and it now stands an unfinished ruin, an eyesore to everybody, and a disgrace to the nation. Washington Monument Associations have been formed in nearly every city of the Union, but with one or two exceptions none of them have succeeded in accomplishing anything. The American people revere the name of Washington to-day as much as they ever did, although if a stranger was to judge of our esteem for his memory by our monuments, he would easily imagine that we held it but lightly in our regards.

A national monument to Mr. Lincoln has been talked about and talked about, but whether it will ever advance so far even as the corner-stones laying appears to be a matter of considerable doubt. That such a structure would do anything to advance the fame of Mr. Lincoln we do not believe, and unless there is sufficient money in hand to finish it in a proper manner, it had much better never be commenced. As for the monument to Mr. Lincoln in this city, which was much talked of at the time of his death, and for which considerable money was collected, nothing has been heard for so long a time that we feel almost justified in concluding that we shall scarcely see it completed in our day.

The monumental works which adorn most of the European cities have been erected under government auspices, and we think that, on the whole, it would be better that this should be the case in this country. Why not make the capitol a Valhalla wherein to enshrine our illustrious dead? Let Greenough's statue of Washington be removed from its open air position opposite to the eastern front of the Capitol to the centre of the rotunda, where it belongs, and let the statues of the other Presidents, when they pass away from earth, surround it. There are niches throughout the Capitol building which might be appropriately filled by statues of other great men; and if the rule was adopted that no man should be entitled to a place among the chosen heroes of the nation until a lapse of twenty years had assured us that his fame rested on a sure and permanent basis, and that a solemn vote of the Senate and House of Representatives should be necessary to place his statue in a niche of the Capitol, we would be able to have a monumental gallery that we could point to with pride, and which would supersede the ill-considered structures, like the National Washington Monument, which ill-advised enthusiasts has commenced, but has never been able to finish.

A Useless Speculation. We publish elsewhere the particulars of the recent suicide in Chicago of a lady who was reported to have been a widowed sister-in-law of Charles Dickens. When the telegraphic paragraph announcing the unhappy end of Mrs. Dickens first appeared, it gave rise to a great deal of comment, which, in the main, was anything but flattering to the humanity of the great novelist. James Gordon Bennett, who never forgives an injury—especially such an injury as he imagined himself to sustain by figuring as the editor of the New York Rowdy Journal—was, as a matter of course, the most bitter in his sarcastic remarks upon the subject, among which we find the following:—"Considering the abounding benevolence of Mr. Dickens as a writer of Christmas Carols, and other sentimental stories, is not the death of this poor widow on Christmas Eve a theme for the most touching Christmas Carol ever produced?"

The New York Times—whose editor appears to have forgotten all about his former associations with the New York Rowdy Journal, under the guise of Mr. Jefferson Brick—took a different view of the subject, based on the following paragraph:—"We believe that the wife of Mr. Augustus Dickens is still living in England, and has been supported by Charles Dickens ever since her husband came to this country in company with the lady whose decease is now announced."

If there is any truth in this assertion of the Times, Mr. Dickens is certainly relieved from all the odium that would have attached itself to his name in connection with the melancholy affair. Until it is proved beyond all doubt that the Chicago suicide was the lawful sister-in-law of Mr. Dickens, all speculation upon his lack of benevolence and common humanity is held in abeyance. But if the assertion of the Times should prove true, the name of the great novelist is relieved from reproach only at the expense of his dead brother's reputation. Altogether, the subject is one with a very unhappy bearing.

A CONVERSATION-TALK.

Bill: Ho! Sam! Sam: Ho! Bill! Bill: What for do you look so shabby, Sam? Sam: Who's shabby? Guess you're proud, with your new clothes. Bill: New clothes! They ain't new a bit, I've had 'em six months. Sam: Six months! Why, that's longer than I've had mine. And mine are getting a little rusty. Bill: Rusty! You mean they are going to seed! Sam: Well, then, seedy, if that suits you better. Bill: Now, Sam, you don't mean to tell me you have had those only six months? They look ten years old, at least. Sam: William, my boy, I haven't had 'em six months. Bill: Now, tell a body, Sam, where did you get 'em, and what did you pay? Sam: Well, fact is, I got 'em cheap, paid only $30 for the whole rig. Got 'em at Sacy, Fice & Co.'s. I think the name was. Bill: Sacy! Fice! You were sacrificed, Sam. Why, that's the name of the man that sold you. Sam: No, Bill, you're fooling. Fose fellows said they were cheaper than anywhere else on earth. Sam: Yes, or in the moon, either. All moonshine, Sam; every bit of it. Sam: Now, tell us about yours, Bill. Bill: Well, fact is, I guess you must know, this whole suit cost me only $28. Sam: Why, I reckon I was sold! Where did you get 'em, William? Bill: Got 'em at Rockhill & Wilson's; to be sure. I don't go anywhere else. Sam: What! Those fellows with the big brown stone store on Chesnut street? Not for me, if you please. Big rigs, and much plate glass in the windows! Bill: Look here, Sam! They got all those things good many years ago, when they didn't cost as much as now; and they can keep 'em as cheap as anybody. Come with me, next time you are going to town, and look at the clothes and the prices. Guess you need a new suit, anyhow. Them 'ere 's nearly 'gin out. Sam: Bill, quit making fun of my 'sacree'! I'm in for a 'Brown Stone Hall suit, short rig, if you please. Bill: I'm going to town, to-morrow, Sam. Will you come along? Sam: Count me in, then. I am shabby. THEY GO! And as the long tales in the weekly papers say, the rest of it will be "CONTINUED IN OUR NEXT."
