

Constitutional Government in the East of Europe.

From the London Saturday Review. Constitutional government is now on its trial in the East. Greece, Modavia, Wallachia, and Serbia are constitutional States. Turkey is encircling the despotic power of the Sultan by local institutions, and by extending the subject in the practice of self-government, which, when united with an independent legislature, forms a sure foundation for constitutional liberty than all the written constitutions of France since the Revolution.

They were informed that the British Government considered they would do well not to choose a King under twenty years of age, but rather a prince of mature years, and of some of the European nations. The interest and policy of Great Britain rendered the acceptance of the Greek throne by an English prince a measure not likely in the long run to be satisfactory to the British Government. England, Fortunate, diplomatic arrangements had rendered the acceptance of the crown by an English prince impossible. Earl Russell, at his conjuncture, has been obliged to select a prince who, while often contrasts so oddly with his absence as regards the choice of fitting times and occasions, gave the Greeks a lecture on the qualities they ought to look for in their future monarch.

Without such a jobbing and some violence. Public opinion looks to the King to improve the morality of the Government, and the Prime Ministers of Greece view with aversion and indignation any proposal of a royal authority in this direction. They endeavor to convince the people that a constitutional King must reign, and not govern; but the doctrine directly opposed to the wish of the people. The people desire a monarch who can and will govern according to the Constitution, and not a King who allows the powers which he is invested by the Constitution to be used by his favorites or party purposes.
