DISCONTENT IN IRELAND. A RECENT number of one of the weekly comic papers of London contained a double-page cartoon, representing Mr. Gladstone in the act of tendering to an Irish peasant girl a sprig of shamrock with four leaves. The following stanza by Samuel Lover is quoted below:-"I'll seek the four-leaved shamrock in all the fairy

And if I find the charmed leaves, oh, how I'll weave Oh, I will pisy th' enchanter's part in casting bliss And not a tear or aching heart shall in the Isle be The leaves of Mr. Gladstone's magical sprig contain the following inscriptions:-"Disendow-"Disestablishment," "Religious Equality," and "Grants to Asylums," the four great features of the bill which he has introduced into the House of Commons as the means of giving content and prosperity to Ireland. That this bill will ultimately pass the House of Commons by a majority of one hundred is regarded as a certainty, and when it comes before the Tory House of Lords it is scarcely probable that it will encounter any very formidable opposition. The whole English system is now in a transition state, and even the strongly conservative element in the upper house will venture to set its face against the onward march of liberal ideas. Its only chance of escaping ruin lies in pursuing the directly opposite course. A determined opposition to the disestablishment of the Irish Church on the part of the titled aristocracy of England could result only in dealing it a serious, if not a fatal blow. Jealous of their privileges and proud of their illustrious ancestry, the English nobles are necessarily almost unanimous, at heart, in their opposition to every movement which will tend to undermine their stability by destroying any of the kindred monopolies of power. But their leaders are not entirely destitute of discretion, and can readily perceive that, if the disestablishment scheme is defeated in the House of Lords, the result will create a popular reaction against the aristocratical element which will ultimately be productive of the most disastrous results. The issue placed before the people of Great Britain at the late Parliamentary elections was one of general reform, but this scheme of disestablishment was its leading feature. The result of the elections was an overwhelming endorsement of the measure, and its friends were led to hope that its triumphant success would tend in a great degree to pacify the Irish people. The disestablishment of the Irish Church has been advocated as a measure of simple justice, and the passage of the bill for effecting it may certainly be regarded as a pledge on the part of England to adopt, even at this late day, a line of policy towards Ireland in which justice shall be the predominant feature. But it would appear that the misrule to which the island has so long been subjected, has given rise to so much discontent, that the rospect of an entire change in the policy of England will not suffice to eradicate it, or even to suppress its manifestations. The cable informs us that at the ovation tendered at Cork to Warren and Costello, the recently discharged Fenians, previous to their departure for the United States, the enthusiasm was unbounded, and even extended to a large and disorderly crowd outside the building. Inflammatory speeches were made by the Mayor of Cork and others, Warren and Costello were highly culogized, and altogether the affair showed that the prospect of justice has not tended to allay the discontent which has taken a firm hold upon the Irish While such manifestations will serve as an argument for the immediate necessity of disestablishment, they will in turn weaken the hands of its advocates by repelling those who do not belong to the extreme radical wing of the Liberal party, and by furnishing the conservatives with a formidable argument in the shape of an assertion that nothing short of a complete severange of Ireland from England satisfy the agitators and leaders of former country. In this way the prine and patriotism of the English people will be aroused, and the reaction may possibly delay the adoption of some measures of relief which are imperatively required, and which the Liberal leaders may be quite willing to urge at once. 'In this view of the case, the friends of

POPULAR EDUCATION AT HOME AND ABROAD.

Ireland made a sad fillstake when they tendered an ovation to Warren and Costello. If they had suffered them to depart in peace and quiet, the best interests of their country would have been much more advanced.

A BILL has recently been introduced in the British Harliament to promote popular education. It is called the Endowed Schools bill, and while it contemplates a slight extension of educational privileges to the poorer classes, it falls far below the requirements that are deemed essential in the progressive Continental nations and in the northern portions of the United States. In England and Wales there are 11,972 schools for the poor connected with the Church of England, but of these the Government assisted only 5017, leaving 6955 entirely unaided, and the number of parishes exceeded by 2737 the number of schools.— The theory of the English system is that religious and secular instruction must be combined, and the Government throws upon the prominent denominations or charitable societies the responsibility of taking the initiative in all efforts to educate the poorer classes. It only doles out the meagre pittance of eight shillings for each scholar who regularly attends the schools which are officially inspected. The Parliamentary grants for education in England and Wales, from 1839 to 1860, amounted to less than $27,000,000, or an average of but little more than a million and a quarter of dollars per annum.

In 1866 the Parliamentary grants for education in all portions of the United Kingdom amounted to but a little more than $3,000,000. In this country single States appropriate much more money for the education of the children of a few millions of people than the British Parildment expends for the benefit of a population nearly as large as that embraced in the whole, Union, Against the $3,000,000 expended i

ACHARMANIA

1866 by the British Parliament, New York expended in 1867 more than seven and a half millions of dollars, Pennsylvania appropriated more than five millions, and the young Commonwealth of Illinois expended in 1867-8 more than six millions.

The contrast in the number of schools and scholars is as striking as the contrast in the amounts expended. The schools inspected in England, Scotland, and Wales in 1866 contained accommodations for only 1,724,288 children, and the average attendance was but 1,082,055. The number attending school in three of the largest American States, at the date of the last reports, was as follows:-New York, 949,203; Pennsylvania, 800,515; Ohio, 704,467; a total of 2,454,485, or more than twice as many pupils to a population not half as great as the population of England, Wales, and Scotland.

The American system, however, is by no means perfect. Improvements are constantly being devised, and it is unfortunately too true that, notwithstanding the liberal provision made for a universal diffusion of the blessings of education, many children are suffered to grow up in ignorance, through the carelessness of their parents or the want of proper guardianship. In Prussia and several other continental countries, every child is obliged by law to attend either a public or a private school, and many of the zealous American friends of education earnestly advocate the enactment of similar laws in this country. Public sentiment does not seem to be yet prepared to endorse this policy, but the number of its supporters is constantly increasing.

In Italy such deplorable ignorance prevails that four-fifths of the population can neither read nor write. In Spain, according to the latest report, the total number of pupils was but little more than one million. Russia is still so barbaric that the number of pupils in all her vast population is less than one million, and it is estimated that not one Russian in three hundred can read and write. France is far ahead of Great Britain in the liberality of her educational system, and few American States secure a more general school attendance of the rising generation. Of 37,510 French communes, only 694 are destitute of schools, and at the date of a recent report 4,436,470 children attended public or private schools. The United States, as a nation, by no means leads the van in the great popular educational movement of the century, and education is being much more universally diffused in Switzerland, Germany, and France than in many portions of this country.

It was not cut as coats are now;
The sleeves were made so tight,
He had to rise to put it on
Before the morning light.

With collar of tremendous size, This venerable cost Rose up against the back of his head, And warmed his neck and throat.

So queer in those peculiar days The fashions did prevail, The hinder part of the coat was shaped Much like a swallow's tail. They kept things long in Grandpa's days; From records it appears That he wore this most remarkable coat Some fifteen or twenty years.
