AT THE SEASIDE.

The Route to Cape May-Changes Since the Olden Time-Reminiscences of an Old Inhabi-tant-The Stockton House-The Beach-A Successful Senson-Combination of Attractions Sen-shore Pleasures.

From Our Own Correspondent. CAPE ISLAND, N. J., June 28, 1869. Of all the blessings which railroads have conferred upon the country, one of the most important to Philadelphia and Philadelphians, in the sweltering summer season, is the opportunity they enjoy, via the West Jersey Railroad, of reaching this delightful spot by a pleasant journey of a few hours. The route is pleasing and attractive, as it penetrates a country which is improving very rapidly, and passes through a number of thriving towns, including Gloucester, Glassbore, Millville, the famous Vineland, and various cities in embryo, which as yet figure more largely on ground plans than on the ground. The substantial improvements, however, are so numerous, that a continual panorama of the progress which has vivined Southern Jersey is presented, and the traveller is led up, by steady gradations, to the grand attractions concentrated here.

An old gentleman informs me that when he took summer trips in his youth from Philadelphia to Cape May, the best mode of travel was by a lumbering market wagon, which wended so slowly along the sandy roads, through the wilderness, that as many days were required for the journey as hours now. He considered, however, that the pleasures of the scenery and bathing amply repaid his tollsome trip; and while he culogizes the advantages of modern improvements, the prejudices of his early education, nited with his well-preserved vigor, still make him refer a buff bath before dawn to the more decorous encounter with old ocean in the draggling habiliments of a bathing-dress.

"Ah, sir," said he, "the railroads are wonderfu things. Only to think of coming down here from Philadelphia in less than four hours, and of going over to the Pacific coast in a week. When I was young I went across the Allegheny Mountains. We had to camp out on our way, and it took us two months to reach Cincinnati. Then I went down to New Orleans in a flat-boat, and I spent three months making my way back through the wilderness, on an Indian pony, to Western Pennsylvania. There have been mighty improvements since that time; and although the West has been so greatly changed, the East seems to have done quite as much, in its way, too. I see fine houses stretching for miles in Philadelphia, over places which, when I was a boy, were considered dangerous on account of snakes. And who could have thought that down here, at Cape May, they would have ever built so many fine houses, introduced gas, organized a police board, run up the prices of land and rents to a metropolitan standard, and that they would ever erect a building like that (pointing to the Stockton House), which looks as grand as the finest public buildings at Washington, and can accommodate as many guests as all the watering place hotels that were in the whole country when was a boy."

I have often been told that Cape May has the finest beach on the coast, and although my knowledge of the subject is limited, I should not wonder if this assertion was substantially true. The breakers break beautifully. While old ocean cannot be headed off or dammed up, it is at least systematically and advantageously rounded off here, so as to ensure bathers at once safety and a first-class bath on its well protected and gently sloping beach.

A large number of summer guests have already assembled here, but the preparations for a successful season are so ample that there is plenty of room for thousands more, and there is no doubt that they will come. It will be difficult to find such a combination of attractions at any other watering place on the continent. The lavish hand of nature has spread her bounties on every side, and art, en terprise, and industry have wonderfully improved and utilized them. In the background are cultivated fields, then elegant cottages, then a cordon of stores, restaurants, and hotels, which supply all the luxuries that a sybarite could crave; then, in the front, the grand waves, with their incessant roar and their picturesque rollings, preach eternally the insignificance of man and his mightiest works when they are contrasted with the wonders of creation; of the clouds, which add new charms to the impres-

Crowds have come and still greater crowds are coming to Cape May. Some for health, some for pleasure, some for a day's excursion, some for a whole season's campaign, some to inaugurate new flirtations, and some to be haunted by the ghosts of old ones. The pale, wan, sickly child will gain a new lease of life, the vitality sapped by dissipation or over-exertion will be renewed, and the gavest of revellers will wash away the physical dregs of their SCHUYLKILL.
