IS GENERAL GRANT A FAILURE?

A good many people are exercised over the momentous question whether General Grant, as a President, is a failure. The bulk of the professional politicians have little hesitation in flatly affirming that he has greatly disappointed them. They charge upon him ignorance of civil affairs, accompanied by indifference to the advice of the multitude of sage counsellors who would gladly direct his erring footsteps in the true path of Presidential greatness. "If he would only listen to that great statesman, Snooks," says one, "he could ret redeem his administration;" or "if he ad followed the counsels of the illustrious Spriggins," says another, "he would have avoided all the mistakes that have diminished his popularity." The greatest trouble about hese speculations is that, as we have a thous ad Snookses and Sprigginses pulling in a ousand different ways, and with a thousand if is axes to grind, the surrender of the sident to any particular adviser would use the ire of his nine hundred and ninetyne rival would be advisers; and it is barely pesible that, on this account, it is better TOT Ulysses to plod on in his e n way, even if he does blunder casionally. Grave errors in the matter of pointments are also alleged, and in some es with a show of justice. It could scarcebe expected that a soldier fresh from the amp, where patriotism was measured by steady devotion to the national service or valorous deeds, would be able to pass impartial judgment, in all cases, upon the conflicting claims of the heroes of the hustings, the controllers of caucuses and conventions, the chairmen of executive committees, and the rag-tag and bob-tail of the grand army of office-seekers who would gladly devour every green and living thing in the land. It is highly probable that occasionally the place which should have been given to Smith, as a due reward for party services rendered, has fallen into the possession of the less deserving Jones, and that the new edition of the Blue Book for 1869 will record a distribution of salaries and emoluments decidedly distasteful. not only to the whole body of the Democracy. but even to many magnates of the Republican organization. This calamity will occur, however, to some extent, even under the rule of Presidents who have made a judicious distribution of the spoils the great study of their lives, and it is impossible to avoid disappointments and mistakes when the applicants are ten times as numerous as the positions. The gravest charge against the President, in this connection, is that he has shown a desire to bestow official favors upon his relatives, and upon those who have rendered personal services to himself. Like a true Scotchman, he stands by his friends and his clan; and even if the truth of the accusation, in its broadest sense, be acknowledged, we cannot see that any great harm will necessarily result to the nation from this feature of his policy. The most damaging imputation that can be made against an aspiring politician is, that he is not true to his friends, and it is scarcely just to condemn Grant for the readiness with which he has learned one of the first lessons of the class that is now disposed to condemn him. Another charge is that he is so averse to display as to be positively awkward on grand ceremonial occasions. But painful as it may be to the butterflies of fashion, or the lovers of ostentation, to witness his shortcomings in ball-room etiquette, or his steady avoidance of oratorical demonstrations, we think the people can easily be induced to pardon these deficiencies. It matters little to the thirty-eight millions of toilers scattered through the land whether he wears his hat or takes it off in the presence of the dashing belles of the sea-side, and Andy Johnson did enough in the line of commending the Constitution and thirty-six stars to the protection of his countrymen, to exonorate his successor from all forms of stump-speechifying. For a time the N. Y. World bitterly assailed the President for his alleged connivance at the schemes of the Cuban revolutionists and his apparent neglect to enforce the neutrality laws. The recent action of the administration, however, has so thoroughly vindicated its vigilance in this respect, that its assailants are obliged to change their tactics and to accuse it of undue subserviency to Spain. Meanwhile the excess of the receipts of the Treasury over the expenditures constitutes a crowning glory of the Presidential policy. It is due, in a large measure, to the resolute determination of the new Executive to infuse economy, efficiency, and honesty into all branches of the revenue service; and in view of the increasing im. portance of financial questions, there could be no better claim to the confidence of the people than that which is being steadily established by the rapid reduction of the national debt.

affray, when the merest soothing word would have made everything lovely and serene, when a single distasteful utterance would have plunged the whole assemblage into Democratic chaos; when, in short, the convention had nothing else under the sun to do for the moment except to fight-at this critical period Vaux was invited, by unanimous resolution, to address the convention. But Vaux did not respond, and, although he did not respond, expectancy held sway until the crisis was passed and bloodshed, with all other possible attendant ills, averted.

The cause of Vaux's silence on this momentous occasion was a mystery at the time, the solution of which is just made clear. The stupendous and stifling emotions which welled up from his overflowing heart on the evening of June 16, when he made his famous address to the Knights of the Temple at the Academy of Music, were sufficiently stupendous and stifling to prostrate any ordinary man, and even to interfere seriously with the digestion and ratiocination of such an extraordinary man as Vaux himself. Time, however, is the great cure-all, and time will usually restore to their normal action the functions of an intellect so disordered, by undue yielding to the emotional, as to swamp the higher law in a flood of idealistic power. Hence, although Richard was not sufficiently himself again to venture with safety before McMullin, Buckalew, Lyster, Hughes, Galbraith, and the rest of "the boys" at Harrisburg, the lapse of another fortnight sufficed to do the work, and yesterday afternoon "the veteran" appeared before the convention for revising the rules of the party, in such perfect command of all the wondrous faculties of his being that he was able, without the slightest degree of hesitation, to announce to his co-laborers in the field of party reform his "humble judgment" on a very important matter. The convention, Vaux declared, on accepting the high honor of the chairmanship,

"Has assembled here to-day to do what, in my humble judgment, shall enable this great party in Philadelphia, as it demands, to have its nominations, and its delegates, and its conventions, stand the test of severest scrutiny."

Such, in the "humble judgment" of Vaux, was the grand object which had called the representatives of the Philadelphia Democracy together. It smacks so strongly of desirability, approaches so closely to absolute and downright necessity, that it is made to partake, in some measure, of the sublime. There is to be no tomfoolery about the thing. The recent nominations, and delegates, and conventions of the Democracy in this city have not been able "to stand the test of severest scrutiny," and while Vaux is free to admit this incontestable fact, his co-reformers are eager to add their testimony by outbursts of wild applause. Else why these words from the lips of Vaux, immediately preceding the sentence already quoted?-

"There never was a time in the history of the Philadelphia Democracy more important to its fu-Ture prosperity and success than the 27th day of July, 1869. With the past, with the action of conven-tions that have preceded us, we have nothing to do. We were called and have convened for no purpose but the future?"

Having thus ratified the universal condemnation of the Stewart-Ahern ticket; having thus confessed that the very weakest sort of scrutiny unsettles the riotous assemblages at the National Guards and Washington Halls; and having thus laughed in the face of his indignant followers, with the assurance that the convention is to deal only with the future, leaving the dead past to bury its dead, according to the fashion of the times, Vaux starts upon another line of thought, scents the unsavory negro in his path, pours the vials of his wordy wrath upon his head, and, fearful that mere words will not win the battle for a white man's government, begins to froth and foam and talk about the necessity for a fight, "if he is not greatly mistaken." This little qualification gives us great joy. It shows that, although Vaux, inspired and impelled by the tumult of applause with which almost every sentence was received, had contrived to excite himself so unduly as to bring on the symptoms of an attack of white man on the brain, his "humble judgment" was still in full play, and whispered him that he might possibly be mistaken, and possibly mistaken to a very considerable extent. We are inclined to indorse this view of the matter, and to express our belief that Vaux will die as he has lived, a man of peace, averse to musketry as well as to nigger voting. SILENCE THAT DREADFUL BELL! This morning the Fairmount Engine Company started on an excursion to Atlantic City. This event has probably been looked forward to with many agreeable anticipations by the members of the company and their friends, and we hope that the anticipations will be fully realized. By a very large number of the citizens of Philadelphia, however, no interest whatever is felt in the movements of the Fairmount Engine Company: and although there are perhaps few hard hearted enough to desire that they may meet with any misadventures to mar their pleasure, there are very many who care nothing at all about them one way or another. This may not be very complimentary to the members the Fairmount Engine Company, of but it is the truth, nevertheless; and these citizens, so long as they do not interfere with the movements and legitimate pleasures of the members of the company, have some rights that firemen are bound to respect. We therefore object, in the name of all the citizens of Philadelphia, to the Fairmount or any other engine company making their pleasure trips public nuisances. This morning, before four o'clock, everybody within a radius of more than half a mile was aroused from slumber by the furious ringing of the Fairmount Engine bell, which was continued without intermission for an hour. This method of testifying to their jubilation at the prospect of a day's pleasure at Atlantic City might have been very good fun for the members of the company, but to those who were and discord were almost equally poised, when not interested in the jollification it was an the pickpockets without and the picked- annoyance of the most serious character. And pockets within were contemplating another when we consider the number of sick persons tation.

game a proper hardenesses and he is set the subsects and also beautions at a property to watch and the within the sound of the bell, who were ago- [nized for a full hour by the senseless performance, it was an outrage that deserves the severest condemnation.

This occurrence illustrates what was said in these columns, but a few days ago, on the inexpediency of permitting bell-ringing at all within the city limits. The church bells, that keep up a dismal clangor for the greater part of each Sabbath, disturbing the rest and quiet that people have a right to enjoy on that day; the fire-bells, that are sounded at all hours of the day and night; the factorybells, and all others, have nothing that can be urged in their favor except custom, and the custom has become one that would be much more honored in the breach than the observance. Some persons may take a delight in the ringing; but, leaving out of the question the sick, hundreds of whom are day and night within the sound of each one of these tintinabulatory tormentors, there are very many who experience the greatest annoyance from them.

In every large city there are necessary noises that nervous people have to submit to, whother they like them or not; but bell-ringing is not necessary, and it is a nuisance of the first magnitude, that ought to be abated. It is not possible to estimate the actual suffering that was caused this morning by the senseless performance of the Fairmount Engine excursionists. Within the sound of their bell were hundreds of sick persons who had been turning all night on beds of pain, and who perchance were just falling into slumber and cessation of suffering, when their agonies were renewed because a party of men wished to inform the city in the most public manner possible that they were about to start for a day's jollification at the seaside. It is preposterous that such an outrage should be permitted in a great city supposed to be inhabited by civilized people, and the occurrence furnishes an excellent argument in favor of the speedy abolition of the whole ridiculous custom of bell-ringing within the city limits.

STATISTICS OF FRANCE .- The Bulletin des Lois gives some interesting statistics of the inhabitants of France during the last twenty years. In 1846, the population was 35,400,486; in 1856, 36,039,364; in 1866, 8,067,094. In the first ten years the increase was 666,608, and in the second period 2,027,780. The annexation of Savoy and Nice in 1860 accounts for this large disproportion for the ratio of increase in France is only one-fifteenth of that of the United States. In 1863, the births were 936,937; the deaths, 795,607; the marriages, 208,609. In 1868, the births were 1,006,258; the deaths, 884.573; the marriages, 802,186.
