SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1869.

"MY LUNGS HAVE NOT BEEN SHOT." THE public has rarely or never been more deeply interested in a criminal trial than in the case now pending in the Court of Quarter Sessions. The result deeply concerns the entire community. It involves two questions of the highest importance: whether the whisky ring can set at defiance all laws, and whether assassins can be tolerated in this community. It is for the Court and jury to determine whether Marrow and Dougherty are guilty or innocent, and this question we do not propose to discuss here, but the nature of the efforts made to secure their acquittal is in the highest degree reprehensible, and scarcely less criminal and outrageous than their own imputed crime. On the first day of the trial, McLaughlin, when produced in court. directly contradicted the statements he had previously made to the Mayor, and this circumstance is best explained by the extraordinary efforts of the special friends of the prisoners, or their counsel, to obtain opportunities for changing his apparent determination to tell the truth. These machinations were only too successful, and a display of the kindred talent for spiriting away witnesses was made yesterday, in the mysterious absence of a police officer who is supposed to be able to complete the chain of evidence offered on behalf of the Commonwealth. With McLaughlin ready to forswear himself. and Officer Kelly absent in defiance of an order of the Mayor, the chances of the defendants for acquittal were materially improved, and there was even a fair that a reasonable doubt of their identity might have been created if Detective Brooks had also been unable to appear in court. But deeply as he was injured, his assailants were only murderers in thought, or in a moral sense, and while they cannot be hung for their crime on the one hand, neither can they escape on the other the recognition which they had wickedly but vainly hoped to avoid by a completion of their infamous tas't. The counsel for the prisoners, therefore, saw that despite all the tampering with McLaughlin, and all the efforts that had been made to ensure the absence of Officer Kelly, their clients were still in peril, if the force of the testimony given by Mr. Brooks was not broken. His statement was wonderfully clear and concise. No man can read it without being struck with the earnest desire to "tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," by which it is pervaded, and the careful avoidance of any declaration which he did not know to be absolutely and unqualifiedly true. After he swore at a critical stage of the proceedings that Marrow was one of three men he had seen in Keenan's store, and that he believed Dougherty to be the man he had subsequently seen enter the carriage on Front street, it seemed that he had been providentially rescued from the grave to confront and confound his assailants. The vile and despicable tactics which have made modern criminal lawyers scarcely less infamous than the scoundrels they turn loose upon the community, became very essential to the defense. A rigid cross-examination was to have been expected, but no one could have been prepared for the brutal and totally unjustifiable remark for which Mr. Mann was properly rebuked by the Court. Bearing in mind that the clients for whom he speaks are on trial for the attempted assassination of an officer distinguished for his conscientious devotion to an important public duty, because he possessed the rare virtue of discharging that duty thoroughly and well, and that his partial recovery from the severe wound the prisoners are alleged to have inflicted is almost miraculous, no browbeating champion of crime has ever said anything more outrageous than the exclamation to Mr. Brooks: - "If this case is to be decided by noise, I can beat you, for my lungs have not been shot!" We do not wonder that a portion of the audience cried "Shame!" in as loud a tone as the proprieties of the place and the occasion would permit. and we are only astonished that the courts do not follow up the condemnation of such language by striking from the roll attorneys who permit themselves to use it. It is enough for the prisoners to clear themselves of the charge on which they are arraigned, and there

IT is reported that a proposition is on foot to return to the Orleans family their confiscated property in France, and that a law to annul the decree of 1852 will be introduced at the next session of the Corps Legislatif. We are not informed whether the Emperor is the prime mover in this matter, but it is more than probable that he is; and, while it is better late than never, it would have been much more to his credit if he had allowed his generosity to influence him some years ago. All the members of the House of Orleans are, we believe, in comfortable circumstances, old Louis Philippe, in particular, having taken pains to lay up something against a rainy day, and place it out of the reach of danger-a practice that has been imitated by many of the monarchs of Europe, and not improbably by the Emperor Napoleon himself. There is no just reason, how. nant than its bark. And hence our rejoicing should be deprived of their hereditary estates,

make them legitimate objects of malignant persecution by their successor.

Perhaps the Emperor is influenced in this matter by a premonition of the fate that is awaiting his own family, and he is auxious to set a good example that others will perhaps imitate in his own case.

THE DISESTABLISHMENT of the Irish Church has thrown it, to a great extent, upon its own resources, and its members have been aroused to the necessity for greater exertion on their part, if they expect even to maintain their own. That the present state of affairs will be of real benefit to the Church, and calculated to advance its spiritual welfare, can scarcely be doubted. Hitherto the Irish Church has been stagnant; its clergy have had no incentives to real work, and, with immense wealth at their command and the whole power and influence of the State to back them, they have been content to enjoy their sinecures and to leave the real interests of the religion they profess to take care of themselves. It is one of the greatest scandals connected with the Irish Church that, with all the power and influence of enormous wealth, it has made no impression whatever on the people of the country, while the Catholic clergy, poor, and often shamefully oppressed, have beaten them at all points. Largely subsidized as the Irish Church now is, it must make an advance now or it will gradually fade out of sight; and the clergy have therefore taken the first necessary step by endeavoring to secure the active co-operation of the laity: for the Irish as in the English Church laity have hitherto been denied any voice in deciding upon questions of doctrine or discipline. The cable informs us, however, that at a large meeting held in Dublin on Thursday, over which Archbishop Trench presided, it was decided by a large majority that laymen had a right to a voice and vote in these matters. In this respect the Irish Church is but following the example set by the Episcopal Church in the United States, and the admission of the laity to seats in the conventions will have a tendency to make them something more than were passive supporters of the clergy.

DEAD AT LAST.

AT high noon yesterday, A. J. departed this life, in all the odor of bad repute. It is true that he is still compelled to walk the earth. as certain persons of disrepute were doomed. in the olden time, to wander along the banks of the Styx, imploring in vain a passage over the river. But he is dead-emphatically, unquestionably, and irrevocably dead-dead beyond all hope of resuscitation. We confess to entertaining a feeling of profound relief at the announcement of his demise. Not that we, or the Senate, or the country, or the world at large, had anything to fear from A. J. so long as he remained in the flesh. He has done as much mischief as it is usually permitted that one man should do, but his opportunities for mischief were numbered on the 4th of March last. He retired from the high station to which the blunder of a great political party and the pistol of an assassin had in conjunction raised him in about as defunct a state as we now find him. The New York World has discovered that he was "a man of vivid ideas," and while laboring under a very severe attack of vividness he chose to regard his retirement from the Presidency as a virtual "emancipation" from a slavery of the most galling character. By a singular coincidence, the country felt equally relieved, although it would not be strictly in accordance with the truth to say that the country was also "emancipated" by the termination of A. J.'s lease of power. He had striven, as only a man endowed with remarkable energy could strive, to become the virtual master of the people; and it was solely the fault of the people, without any admixture of blame attaching to himself, that he did not succeed. He was impeached for high misdemeanors in office by the House of Representatives, but the Senate failed to sustain the charges preferred against him, and in so doing served him an ill turn. If he had been removed from the Presidency, he would have proved capable of still further mischief; and as the disposition for mischief was his ruling passion, strong even in death, he would have accomplished his purpose in one way or another. But, happily, the manner in which the impeachment business was disposed of served to counteract any noticeable manifestation on the part of the people looking towards his re-enslavement. If he had been convicted and removed from office by the Senate, he would have become henceforth a formidable opponent of the powers that now be, and his election to the Senate from Tennessee would have followed, almost as a matter of course; and if he had entered again upon the Senatorial arena under such circumstances, he would have proved something more than a nuisance-he can be no excuse for adding to the deep, but would have regarded himself as a political fortunately not fatal, injury already inflicted. martyr, and there would have been, in the Senate and out of it, a party of the same way of thinking sufficiently powerful to have elevated him to the dignity of leadership. But, as the matter stood, A. J. would have entered the Senate as a more nuisance, almost intolerable, it is true, yet comparatively harmless. He would have proved a thorn in the side of his colleagues, a thorn in the side of the Executive, a thorn in the side of the country. He would have worried, and tormented, and taunted the majority, the Government and the people, and the vexation would have been all the more severe because it sprung from a source that was capable only of vexing and incapable of appreciating rebuke and reproof, and chastisement suited to its mild deserts. In short, he would have been a little, insignificant, lop-eared cur, given to snarling and yelping and an occasional scratching, and not the formidable bull-dog whose bite is more poigever, because the Orleans family have been at his political demise, his final and complete driven from the throne of France, that they collapse. The country can now afford to lament in all sincerity his many shortcomings as their errors and faults were not such as to | and transgressions, to pray for his speady and sound conversion, to ignore his dead-alive existence, to dismiss him henceforth from its thoughts.
