DANTE ALLIGHIERI IN THE CASTLE OF LIZZANA.

A correspondent of the London Athenæum writes as follows:—

About two miles from the romantic town of Roveredo, on the post road from thence to Verona, passing through the Val Lagarina by the course of the winding Adige, rises an abrupt and precipitous mass of limestone, which, on one side, seems to have been violently separated from the strata in its neighborhood; on the other, sinks down by a gradual declivity towards the general level. On the slope of this rock, high above the road, are a few courses of an old wall of rough but regular masonry; they measure about 15 feet in length by 12 in height, and are partly screened by trees: these are the last remains of a once famous castle in which, in the early part of the fourteenth century, Dante Allighieri was an honored guest.

The castle of Lizzana—for thus it is still called—is believed to be as old as the conquest of the Romans, and to have been erected, probably, by the patrician family Licinia, from whom its name is thought to have been derived. In the time of the Lombards, it was held by Ragilone di Lagara. In 1014, the Emperor Henry the Second was entertained here on his way back to Germany. In the twelfth century, the Guelph Jacopino, Count of Lizzana and lord of Roveredo, resided here: he was overpowered by the Ghibellines, but subsequently returned to the castle, and became Seignor of all the valley of Lagaro. On his death, the lordship passed, by the marriage of his daughter and heir, into the noble family of Castelbarco. There, from the twelfth to the fifteenth century, the Counts of Castelbarco held their brilliant courts.

The Venetians, in 1439, put an end to them and to the castle at the same time. The republic occupied Roveredo, and, desirous to obtain Lizzana, accused the Count, who then possessed it, of bad faith—a vulgar trick of tyrants in all ages. To the meek remonstrance of the Count, the Venetians replied with their artillery; and the venerable castle never recovered from the rough treatment it then received. The Counts of Castelbarco, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, were intimately connected with the reigning lords of Verona. Guglielmo da Castelbarco was the chief friend of Alberto della Scala, who succeeded his brother Mastino as ruler of Verona in 1277. In 1285, Guglielmo was appointed by Alberto Podesta of Verona: in 1288 he was re-elected, and confirmed again in the office in 1289; in 1300 Alberto appointed him his vicar in the valleys of the Giudicarie; in 1302, at the urgent desire of the Bishop of Trent, he went to Verona to endeavor to negotiate a peace with Bartolomeo della Scala, the eldest son and successor of Alberto, and by his personal influence with the Scaligeri, and his courteous and amiable manners, accomplished a difficult and delicate undertaking, much to the satisfaction of the pugnacious prelate, who sorely repented him, says the historian Girolamo dalla Corte, of the turmoil and contests he had excited. On the death of Bartolomeo della Scala, in 1304, his brother Alboino succeeded him, and, four years later, at his particular desire, his younger brother, Can Francesco, better known as Can Grande, was joined with him in authority. Alboino was of a meek and timid spirit, and much averse to military pursuits, in which his younger brother delighted. It is highly probable that, even before this, Can Grande had been of much assistance to Alboino, and had made his influence felt at court. By both of them Guglielmo da Castelbarco was held in the highest esteem; he was, we are told by Dalla Corte, their chief councillor, and no undertaking of importance was engaged in, no decision come to, without first taking his advice. When in Verona, the Count was probably an inmate of the palace of the Scaligeri, and there made, as circumstances would show, the acquaintance and friendship of the exiled poet.

At what precise period, however, Dante availed himself of the invitation of Guglielmo to visit him in his castle of Lizzana, cannot be fixed with such chronological accuracy as some other of the poet's whereabouts, and depends on a previous question, on which his biographers have been much divided, as to when it was that Dante came to regard Verona as his second home. In all probability, this was not till after the capitulation of the chiefs of the Bianchi and their Ghibelline friends in the castle of Montaccianico, in Mugello, in the summer of 1306. Up to this time Dante had lived in hope of restoration to Florence by force of arms or political changes, and moved about with a sort of ubiquity, being found wherever his personal influence might help to promote his object. But after this capitulation, his honor and his interests would dictate another course; and then Verona became his chief ostello. Yet there is satisfactory historical evidence to show that he had visited the Scaligeri before this period, and may have made some sojourn at their court. In 1308-9 Dante left Italy for France, and remained abroad about two years, visiting Belgium, and probably England, and returning back through Germany. We may trace his footsteps in the cantos of his Divina Commedia. His visit to the castle of Lizzana and the Val Lagarina may have been between 1304 and 1306, or after that, but before 1308. It does not appear that he was asked to sign as a witness any document on the occasion, to which reference might afterwards be made: he did not write his name on any piece of perishable parchment, nor did he carve his initials on the crumbling surface of the limestone rock; but he did what was much more enduring: he left an everlasting record of his visit in the imperishable verses of his divine poem. His graphic description, in a few words, of the Slavino di Marco, as seen from the summit of the slope on which the remains of the castle of Lizzana stand, attest his presence here, and will, so long as Italy shall last.

From no other site than this commanding point of view can the astonished visitor survey the stupendous ruin of the limestone strata, and take in at a glance all the features which Dante has so artistically described (see the twelfth canto of the Inferno, verses 4–10.) The authority of chroniclers and local historians, and the traditions of the neighborhood, however well authenticated, might, perhaps, be disputed, but Dante's own record supersedes them all.

The castle of Lizzana could once accommodate a garrison of five hundred men, but its defenders have now dwindled down to two or three farm-servants only; yet, on visiting the castle last autumn, I found the place still almost impregnable, and after having battered away on the wooden gates with a heavy stone for nearly half an hour, I should have been forced to raise the siege, had not an active and obliging lad who was tending sheep on the green hill-side volunteered to scale the outer wall and surprise the guards within, which he did, when one of them came and opened the gates. From Roveredo it is a pleasant walk to this interesting relic in the Val Lagarina; we follow the main road as far as the Madonna del Monte, and then strike off to the left hand by the path which skirts along the side of the hill, gradually ascending till we reach the castle.

Guglielmo da Castelbarco was a generous-minded and benevolent man, and there was much in his character to entitle him to the esteem of Dante. He was also a liberal benefactor to Verona. In 1307 he began to erect, at his own expense, the magnificent church of S. Anastasia, and the convent at the side. In 1313 he undertook to rebuild the Monastery of the Saints Fermo and Rustico.

English visitors to Verona are, for the most part, familiar with the last memorial of this exemplary Count, the elegant monument over the entrance to the convent in front of the Albergo delle Due Torri; it consists of a sarcophagus beneath a semi-gothic canopy, after the Veronese fashion; on the sarcophagus is a reclining figure, which the guide-books pass over irreverently as scarcely worth noticing; but those who love to cherish the memory of the good and great will gaze on the marble effigy with devout interest when they remember that the recumbent figure represents the noble Guglielmo da Castelbarco, once the friend of Dante Allighieri.
