SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1870.

THE EVENING TELEGRAPH, from its original establishment, has been in the receipt of telegraphic news from the New York Associated Press, which consists of the Tribune, Times, Herald, World, Sun, Journal of Commerce, Evening Post, Commercial Advertiser, and Evening Express. The success which has attended our enterprise is, in itself, a sufficient evidence of the freshness, fullness, and reliability of the news which we have received from this source. Last March we entered Into a special contract by which THE EVENING TELEGRAPH has the exclusive use of the news furnished in the afternoon by the Associated Press to its own members, the North American, Inquirer, Ledger, Press, Age, Record, and German Democrat, of this city, and the leading journals of the East, North, West and South; and hereafter THE TELEGRAPH will be the only evening paper published in this city in which the afternoon despatches of the Associated Press will appear.

STANDING ARMIES.

If any new arguments were needed to confirm the wisdom of the founders of our republic in opposing the creation and maintenance of large standing armies, they would be furnished by the modern experience of France. We need this lesson now on account of the regret felt at the prolongation of our war, the prevalence of a feeling that it was invited, in part, by the military weakness of the Government, and the reluctance displayed in some quarters to the reduction of our army to its present standard. But when we see how powerless the regular forces of the Empire were against an uprising of a hostile people, and how quickly a succession of terrible defeats of this vaunted organization followed upon years of infamous peculation, we may well congratulate ourselves upon adherence to the old system of relying, in all great emergencies, upon the citizen soldiery of the land.

It is now growing more and more apparent that one great use to which the French army was put in peace was the enrichment of a horde of Imperial thieves, the ringleader being no less a personage than Napoleon himself. His salary amounted to such an immense sum that with all his audacity he scarcely dared to openly ask the nation to increase it. and to eke it out he became the accomplice of the rascals of a lower rank who pocketed the pay, rations, and supplies of regiments in buckram. As France was thus robbed, America would be victimized under Similar circumstances. In this line of knavery our politicians and contractors need no lessons from the Emperor and his fellow-thieves, and we have plenty of ambitious great men who would delight in plundering tax-payers during a long peace under the pretext that they were maintaining a splendid standing army which, in actual war, would go down before the first powerful foe that attacked it. We need a small regular army as a nucleus. an abundance of well-trained officers, and it is desirable that there should always be a considerable body of well-disciplined volunteers, but there is scarcely any way in which such vast sums of money could be uselessly and injuriously squandered as by an imitation of the system which has produced such disastrous results in France. If threatening foreign complications or domestic revolts render it probable that a large force may suddenly be required, a modification of the Prussian system could be devised here which would assure an abundant supply of good soldiers; and during the present generation, at least we can count confidently upon the skill and valor of those who learned the murderous art in the hard school of the Rebellion. But the corruption for which the regular army of France furnished a pretext, and its inefficiency, were not the only objections to it. It was the bulwark of Napoleon's tyranny at home and abroad. Its ranks were always full enough to keep the French people in subjection, to overawe agitation, to prevent a fair expression of public grievances, and to maintain despotism. We are fortunately free from such dangers, but if a large standing army was maintained in this country, it would be a mere question of time when it would be used to crush American liberty. Sooner or later a pretext would be furnished for its employment as an agent of despotism, and some popular and ambitious general would crush the republic of the United States as Casar crushed that of Rome and as the first Napoleon destroyed the first republic in France.

GEMS concreting fortunes in their tiny facets have furnished a favorite theme for fiction, but even the novelist's imagination could not group around the story of the "Moonstone" more wondrons incidents than have attended the veritable wanderings of that splendid amethyst which was sent to the beautiful creo's Josephine Beauharnois by her imprisoned husband, which thenceforth gleamed upon her hand through all the strange vicissitudes of her eventful life, and after attending her through glory and disgrace, was taken from the clay-cold finger of the divorced Empress to gleam again upon the hand of another Queen. From the dead finger of the dethroned and exiled Hortense it was again taken to follow the marvellous career of her son, to be borne through beggary, exile, and imprisonment until it should again gleam upon a throne of empire, and now it ends as it began, with an imprisoned Beauharnois-Napoleon the Third. The cold, senseless gem lives on, while generations of men rise and fall, and it is only a segment of its life that is comprised between that first Reign of Terror that deluged the streets of Paris with blood and that widely different Reign of Terror that threatens it to-day.

LANGUAGE is the natural expression of individual thought, and necessarily conforms in many respects to the individual peculiarities. No grammar can constrain every mind to work by the same methods, or bring that unruly member, the tongue, into complete subjection to the same rules. In the structure of a language, therefore, may be found the illustration of the mental characteristics of the nation that uses it, and this finds no better illustration than in a comparison between the speech of the French and the Germans. The French, rapid, sharp, epigrammatic, compels a hasty and condensed expression-a broad, unlimited assertion, and almost courts interruption by the structure of its phrase; while the German moves steadily onwards to the close of its ponderous period. which at its very ending modifies the whole sense of the assertion. The French interjects its statement instantly and without reservation; the German must be patiently followed to master its meaning. The French is dramatic, the German didactic; the French brilliant and terse, the German serious and profound; the French incomplete, the German thorough. The Frenchman explodes his thought, as he does his deed, leaving the future to correct its inaccuracies; the German fences his position and explains his meaning thoroughly before he leaves it: his assertion ends with a full stop, the Frenchman's closes

THE REPUBLICAN leaders of France are evidently determined to leave Prussia no pretext for a prolongation of the war. They will accede to everything that can be honorably surrendered. But it is said that King William will not treat with them on any terms, on the ground that they do not possess the requisite authority, the German theory being that the old Corps Legislatif and the Regency is the Government de jure, and the only one competent to frame a binding treaty. There is a certain degree of plausibility in this notion, but the business of hunting up or setting up governments which have not a veritable existence rarely proves profitable, and even German armies will find themselves scarcely competent to control the erratic politics of France. The long-looked-for uprising, which has not been produced by invasion or investment of the capital, may come at last if any open or covert attempt is made to re-establish the empire.

IN THE autumn of 1813 Madame de Stael wrote in the preface to her work on Germany these words:-

"It is three years since I designated Prussia, and the countries of the north which surtion s has this thought; into how ved. That to which the systems of phitoters I d the way is coming to pass, and accepted ence of mind is about to lay in ada...on of the independence of na-

Prussia was then in its infancy. Sixty years, but a small portion of the lifetime of a nation, has since rolled round, and we behold now how its thought has matured into action.

GERMANY, although she has her hands pretty full at present, has yet time to look ahead in such matters, for instance, as education. All the universities being nearly closed now, professors as well as students having gone either to fight or to bind up wounds, the regular programmes for the lectures in the forthcoming winter term are issued and published as usual. Again, twenty-eight out of the thirty non-theological professors of the university at Munich have, at the instigation of the theological professors, issued a stirring protest not only against the Infallibility but against the (Ecumenicity of the Vatican Council. And, while this protest takes its stand on the Bavarian Constitution and State law, the theological faculty in its turn is preparing a manifesto in the same sense upon theological grounds. The publication of the dogma itself in Bavaria will not be undertaken by the unwilling archbishop in a hurry, even if no special ministerial prohibition should be issued against it.

OBITUARY.

Hon. Hiram Ketchum.

The death of Hon. Hiram Ketchum, at Riverdale Westchester county, New York, aged seventy-eight, is the death of another of our valuable and distinguished men who have made great marks in their day and generation. Mr. Ketchum was born in the northern part of New York State, and emigrated to the city of New York over forty years ago, when that city ended at Bleecker street, and when Brooklyn and Jersey City were but little towns, and hence in his lifetime he saw a city grow, and nearly all the institutions in it. In almost all af these institutions, Institutions in it. In almost all af these institutions, religious, civil, literary, scholastic, social, and po-litical, Mr. Ketchum acted a great part. Mr. Ketchum was best known for two events in his life—the one, his ardent, life-long devotion to Daniel Webster, who, next to Edward Curtis and R. M. Blatchford Lee, was his confidential friend; and the other, his sharp and prolonged controversy with M. Blatchford Lee, was his conditionant friend; and the other, his sharp and prolonged controversy with Archbishop Hughes on the public scheols. The two great contentists were well matched in earnestness and perseverance. Frequently both appeared before the other authorities to access the other remaining sides. and perseverance. Frequently both appeared before the city authorities, to argue their respective sides, and as frequently in print. The contest ended with a victory for neither, while the public schools were kept as they had been, open to all, Jew and Gentile. His last appearance before the public, last winter, was in the public press, in resistance to sectarian schools.

was in the public press, in resistance to sectarian schools. The lowe of Mr. Ketchum for Daniel Webster was a tike the love of a woman rather than that of man for man. There was nothing he would not do for Mr. Webster that could be done in honor. He believed in Mr. Webster with his whole heart and soul, and never saw a fault or error in him Hence the Great expounder gave him in most mat ers his entire confidence, while Mr. Ketchum here, on every occated and ennoble the great statesman and orator. Mr. Ketchum had an ambition for political life, but mever fairly got into it. This city during his vigorous manhood was a Clay city, and never fairly gave its heart to Mr. Webster. But Mr. Ketchum as a public speaker was ever welcomed by the Whigs, and as a writer he was one of the best dialecticians of the day. "A Whig from the Start"—his now de pleme at one time—did wonders in saving a great body of the Whigs from running after Governor Seward in all his isms and ologics and ites. In later if, Mr. Ketchum, having "nowhere else to go," voted with the Democracy. He worked hard and the pleme will, whole the Democracy. He worked hard and the moure over his departure; for he was a man that made friends of all who knew him well.
