OBITUARY.

The Rev. Harrison Lambdin. The recent death of the Rev. Harrison Lambdin is another reminder, if one were needed, of the fact that our war against the Rebellion was in many respects a real war of independence, and, like that of Germany in the beginning of this century, the training school for the nation and its best men. The Rev. Mr. Lambdin, who died on Monday, at the age of thirty, in deacon's orders of the Episcopal Church. had fought through nearly the whole of the recent war. When the Rebellion began he was teaching at the Episcopal Academy, just after graduating at the University. Little past twenty, he gave up his studious habits, his artistic pursuits, and his intense love of domestic life, to take part in the war for the Union. Joining Colonel Chanman Biddle's regiment as a subaltern, he exhibited great bravery and military skill in his first battle-that of Fredericksburg. His good conduct in action and on the field soon won for him promotion, and he became an Assistant Adjutant-General, with the rank of Captain, then of Major, and finally by brevet of Lieutenant-Colonel. He served in succession with various brigade and division cemmanders, and his zeal and ability were thoroughly tested and appreciated by Rice and Chamberlain and Crawford and Hoffman, to all of whom he gave most efficient assistance. While serving with General Hoffman he was severely wounded near Petersburg, and although after a long Sickness he was finally able to return to the field, and served to the close of the war, he never recovered his health. Indeed, he was from his enrliest youth so delicate that few of his friends believed that he could withstand the fatigues and exposure of campaigning, yet the hard life gave him fresh strength and new vigor,

His beautiful Christian character, his marked virtues, his hearty enjoyment of all that was good and wholesome in army life, and the perfect immunity which he enjoyed from all its evil induences, all endeared him to his own men and those of his regiment, and in a like degree to the general and staff officers with whom he associated in the later and more distinguished portion of his career in the army of the Potomac. Returned to civil life, he went to work at once and showed the same earnestness in new, and old pursuits. Engaged for a time as draughtsman in Mr. Joseph Harrison's engineering works, his old love of art and literature took him back to teaching, and while he was busily engaged at the Episcopal Academy, he began and carried on his studies for the Episcopal ministry, to which he was admitted last spring. Full of earnest piety, imbued with the purest and highest religious zeal, gifted with great literary skill and restrained from its frequent exercise only by too nice and critical a judgment, utterly unselfish and apparently unconscious alike of his own unusual experience and rare endowments, he gave promise of becoming a useful and, in time, a distinguished officer of the Church. His health, however, was irreparably broken by his incessant hard work, and even a summer spent abroad, where his love of art and his skill with his pencil might have given him the necessary change and rest, was broken by the outbreak of the war, which brought him home. He never recovered sufficiently to set to work at his new labors in the Church, but his life had been spent in its service, and in the midst of his daily avocations he had found time for helping in the establishment of a school for adults, and for instruction both in secular and religious matters, with a zeal and skill which endeared him to his associates. His whole life, short as it was, was full of good works, and it was terminated too soon for others who would have benefitted by it, rather than for himself. MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC. Miss Lizzle Pierson's Debut. The first appearance upon the stage of a young lady aspirant for dramatic honors is generally a trying occasion for all parties concerned -the debutante, the actors, the audience, and the critics. Of the latter, especially, charitable judgment is expected; for a novice can scarcely, with propriety, be judged by the same artistic standard as an experienced actress. It is the critic's principal duty to detect if possible promises of future excellence, and to make all due allowances for the embarrassment that generally renders a debut anything but an artistic success even when talent of a high order is manifested. It is very rare indeed for a young actress to so far overcome the difficulties of her position as to merit hearty praise for her first public performance; but the young lady who personated "Pauline" in the Lady of Lyons last evening at the Arch Street Theatre did prove herself to be so much superior in all the higher qualities of her art to most debutantes. that she is entitled not only to cordial commendation, but to a judgment based upon a different standard of excellence than would have been employed if her acting had been less genuine in its quality. Miss Pierson's debut was a brilliant success, and after all proper allowances are made for embarrassment, crudeness, and other drawbacks, the fact remains that she personated "Pauline" with a grace, dignity, expression, and at times power, that would have done credit to an actress of long experience. The play and the character were both well chosen, for in spite of its high-flown language The Lady of Lyons is a model of dramatic construction, and it is one of the best acting dramas on the stage, and the character of "Pauline," while it makes no heavy demands upon the powers of the actress, furnishes her with some admirable situations and with opportunities for the expression of a great variety of emotions. For some reason which we do not comprehend, the opening scene of the play was omitted and the debutante did not appear until the garden scene in the second act. The representative of "Pauline" was evidently considerably frightened, but she spoke her lines with excellent emphasis, although in too low a tone. Beyond good reading there were no evidences of marked ability until the scene in "Widow Melnotte's" cottage, where "Pauline" learns of the trick that has been played upon her. Here Miss Pierson thre v off her embarrassment, and throughout the entire scene, as well as during the balance of the play, her acting was marked by artistic qualities of a very high order, and the hearty applause with which the large audience in attendance greeted her efforts was fully deserved. Miss Pierson is tall, finely shaped, and with a very prepossessing stage presence. Her features are fine rather than bold, and this will probably interfere somewhat with the expression of the deeper tragic emotions in case she essays the higher walks of the drama, although her facial expression last evening was fully up to the requirements of the part she was performing. Her attitudes were generally very graceful and her gestures appropriate and imposing. Her elocution was good, very good, but almost too studied, except in the animated scenes, where the artificialities of her style disappeared to a great extent, and she became more natural as well as more pleasing. Indeed, the greatest fault we have to find with the performance was in the artificial style that marked both the acting and the elocution, except in the scenes where the debutante allowed herself to be carried away by the emotions of her part. This was an evidence of careful training, and it may do her good service marked portions of her performance last even-to adopt the stage for a profession, the seener she gets rid of it the better. We feel called upon to make these remarks because Miss Pierson played in a manner that entitles her to something more than a merely complimentary notice, and we are doing her a better service by pointing out some of her deficiencies rather than by alluding merely to her merits. Taking her "Pauline" as an artistic effort, it was better than we have seen from some actresses who have trod the stage for years, and it is especially to be commended for its ladylike grace and dignity. If Mies Pierson is able to perform any of the other leading roles of the standard drama in as creditable a manner as she did "Pauline" last evening, she will be entitled to take a place at once upon the stage which few actresses are able to obtain except after years of struggle with the difficulties of their profession.
