DYNAMITE.

Nitro-glycerine was discovered in the year 1847, by an Italian named Ascogne Sobero, but its practical application is entirely due to the researches of Alfred Nobel, a Swedish mining engineer. It does not explode when brought into contact with fire, and remains unchanged even when raised to the temperature of boiling water; but at about forty degrees Fahrenheit it becomes converted into an icy mass, which merely requires friction to develop all its explosive qualities. This peculiarity had been the cause of many lamentable accidents, when M. Nobel commenced a series of experiments with the view of rendering its employment comparatively safe.

After some time, he found that mixing it with about ten per cent. of wood-spirit rendered it practically harmless, and this method is now generally adopted. When required for use, the wood-spirit can be removed, and all the properties of the nitro-glycerine restored by the simple addition of water, which, mixing with the spirit, sets free, as it were, the nitro-glycerine. The only drawback to this plan is that, when the nitro-glycerine is reconverted into its original state, it is of course quite as dangerous as ever.

To obviste this M. Nobel has invented a new mixture, which he terms "dynamite." It consists of seventy-five per cent, of nitroglycerine and twenly-five per cent. of very fine sand, and is a brownish-leoking powder, something like saw-dust, only greasy to the touch. It burns without explosion when placed in a fire or brought into contact with a lighted match. If struck with a hammer on an anvil the portion struck takes fire without inflaming the dynamite around it. As a proof of the perfect secu-rity with which it may be handled, we may mention that M. Nobel has placed a case containing about eight pounds of it (equal to nearly eighty pounds of ordinary powder) on a brisk fire, and that the dynamite was consumed without noise or shock while a similar case was flung from a height of sixty-five feet on a bold rock without producing the slightest explosion. A weight of two hundred pounds was then let fall from a height of twenty feet upon a box of dynamite; the box was smashed, but again there was no explosion.

The usual method of firing dynamite is by means of a copper capsule containing fulminate of silver-the latter being inflamed either by the ordinary slow-match, or by the electric spark. The employment of this cap-sule and detonating composition is absolutely essential for the explosion of dynamite. In order to give some idea of the force developed by such an explosion, it may be mentioned that a spoonful of it placed upon a block of quartz, covered with bricks, and fired, caused the quartz to be broken up into pieces about the size of a pea, and reduced the bricks to powder. Like nitro-glycerine, dynamite congeals at a comparatively high temperature; but, to restore it to its proper condition, it is only necessary to put it in a warm place, or, if it is contained in closed cartridges, to plunge it into warm water.

In mining operations, dynamite possesses manyadvantages over nitro-glycerine, besides those already mentioned.

A CHINESE STORY.

Some years ago, when the Tai-ping rebels were devastating the most fruitful provinces of China, a novel plan was invented for discovering the money and other treasure concealed by the terrified merchants and people on the first warning of the spproach of the rebels. Some ingenious Tai-ping thought within himself that, as men are all devout worshippers of gold and silver, something composed from man would, in all probability, be more efficacious than anything else in discovering hidden treasure, without putting men to the pains of pulling down each separate brick of any suspected place, to get at the coveted hoard. He therefore seized the first prisoner he could lay hands on, and quietly proceeded to cut him up and put him into a large caldron, wherein he was allowed to simmer until a sufficient coating of oil had collected on the surface; this was carefully skimmed, and then a roll of cloth was spread out and soaked in the human oil, after which it was tightly rolled up and converted into a torch. The rebel then lit his torch, and, in a fever of expectation, started in quest of a likely house. Having found one to his taste, he entered, and slowly waved the torch in all directions, intently watching the flame, which shortly commenced flickeringlike a man's fingers clutching at gold ! The rebel was overjoyed at this sight, and felt sure that this was a sign that treasure was concealed exactly where the torch flickered; he accordingly set to work and pulled down that part of the wall, and sure enough there discovered a goodly hoard of silver. This plan was afterwards universally adopted in the Tai-ping camp, and became so notorious that. on an imperial officer-in whose suite was my informant-taking one of the rebels prisoner, he questioned him as to the truth of the report, remarking, at the same time, that he could not possibly believe it. The prisoner declared that such was their method of discovering hidden treasure. Whereupon the officer replied that, as the prisoner persisted in vouching for the truth of the report, he would do himself the pleasure of testing its truth or falsehood on his person. The prisoner was immediately killed, cooked, and converted into a torch, and used with the greatest success !

ROBES DE CHAMBRE.

The Historical Museum in Munich has recently been presented with a new and certainly very curious article; it is the robe de chambre of the late King of Bavaria, Ludwig I, the same who made the famous Lola Montez a countess. The letter which accompanies this present states that the monarch wore this garment for sixty consecutive years. It is to be hoped that it has undergone a thorough scouring previous to being placed among the other curiosities of the museum.

The idea of exhibiting robes de chambre in historical museums is not new; the Musee des Souverains in Paris contains several of them, but they are not all as interesting as that of Ludwig I. This museum is considered by many a very useless institution. How many among the present generation care for most of the sovereigns ! Yet the crown of Charlemagne, the panoply of Francis I and that of Henry IV are worth being preserved; so are the small hat, and the grey coat of Napoleon I. But among these interesting curiosities, the most worthy of attracting our attention is the precious little slipper made of black silk, worn out and patched, a mere rag, whose miserable appearance forms a strange contrast with the gaudy rags around.

This shoe is poor Marie Antoinette's. It slipped from her foot when her mutilated body was taken down from the scaffold. Picked up by a child, it passed into the hands of a royalist family, who kept it religiously for a long time, and afterward bequeathed it to the Musee des Souverains.

Its elegant shape, the delicate texture of
