THE ROUGE REVOLT.

The Field of Operations at Paris.

Paris (April 11) Cor. of the London Daily News. To make oneself master of the entire military arrangements on both sides, it would be necessary to have free transit along and outside the enceiate of Paris, and also along the front of the positions of the regular troops; but without this it is possible to form a tolerably adequate conception of the arrangement of the forces by first wandering about within Parls as far west as possible, observing both what can be seen within the enceinte and what can be made out on the surrounding country from Courbevole on the northwest to Chatillon on the southwest and by then leaving Paris and going to and fro among the neighboring towns and villages on the west side, from Argenteuil, through Bezone, Nanterre, and St. Germain, to Versailles, and from that to St. Cloud, Sevres, and the Plateau de Chatillon. The front of MacMahon's line on the southwest is at Meudon, Clamart, and Chatillon; in or before these villages there is generally fighting going on, the direction of which can be made out from within Paris. going along the road at the back of them from Versailles, along the Plateau de Chatillon, you get a good view of a part of MacMahon's forces which are camped along this road. Versailles itself is full of troops; their tents are ranged along the great avenues and in the park; the great buildings are the military centres, and the town is as much the headquarters of the French army as the seat of the French Parliament. The line of conflict, then, is the whole west ide of Paris. This line has been determined by three conditions:-First, the happy accident that Valerien is in the hands of the while all the other forts are in the hands of the National Guard; second, the Prussian occupation of Fort St. Denis and the neighboring country; third, the fact of Versailles being the seat of government. It appears to be the tendency of the line of fighting to extend itself at both ends. The limit on the north will be given by the boundary of Prussian occupation; on the south there will be no fixed limit, but it is not likely REAL ESTATE AT AUDTION.

hat either side will care to prolong their line in any great force beyord the Seine, unless MacMahon gathers a sufficiently large army to blockade the whole of the circuit of Parls except the Prussian quarter. Though the offensive is, in fact, with MacMahon, this cannot be said without some receivation. The insurgants have quite lately renewed their attack on the Redoute of Chatillon, and the Government is obviously not free from anxiety as to the northern district between St. Germain and Asuleres. It would hardly be possible, however, for the insurgents to attack so far north as to be out of the range of Mont Valerien, without trespassing on Prussian do-main; and their failure to carry Chattlen, which would give them the road to Versallies, is not likely to be redeemed now that new troops are coming in to defend it. Thus, on the whole, we may conceive of MacMahon's front line as acting along the west side of the Scine from Aspleres to Sevres, and from Sevres eastward and have tallen back from the Seine to the enceinte; on the south they hold Forts d'Issy and anvres, between the enceinte and MacMahon's

It is very interesting to compare the present outer and inner lines with the outer and inner lines in the Prussian investiture. At Chatillon and along the hills west as far as Sevres, Mac-Mahon's line is identical with the old Prussian line, and his guns are occasionally on their works: but whereas at Sevres the Prussian line turned westward to keep at a respectful distance rom Valerien, MacMahon, having possession of Valerien, is able to continue his line straight along the Seine, throwing out reserves or reconnoitring parties among the villages on his rear, such as Nanterre and Bezons, in the direction of the old Prussian line. The remains of the great Prussian battery at Carrieres, now being brought down with the pickage by the owner of the ground, are an excellent point from which to survey the whole field of operations, and com-pare its points with those of the Prassian investiture. All this will be perfectly plain with any

The difference between MacMahon's line and the old Prussian line corresponds with the dif-ference of his object. The Prussians had to prevent food from entering Paris, and as long as they succeeded in this, nothing more was necessary. MacMahon cannot attempt this without the joint action of the Prussians, for it is stipulated in the preliminaries of peace that the Northern Rallway is to be open. This railway must, in fact, be neutral in the struggle, and continue to supply Paris, unless the Prussians give up pro lanto their neutrality. It is hardly possible that MacMahon will allow food to enter Paris by the lines on the south and

The explosion is ascribed to a defect in the door of the boiler. Being of cast iron, it is conjectured that there must have been a flaw near the centre. This would explain its breaking into so many pieces. The engineer says that
