DEMOCRATIC HOSTILITY TO THE NEW DEPARTURE.

As the Democracy in former times were divided into Hunkers and Barnburners, Hard Shells and Soft Shells, Lecomptonites and anti-Lecomptonites, so a new division is threatened now, based on diversity of opinion in regard to the new departure. Thousands of voters in the Democratic ranks and hundreds of their fuglemen are puzzled to know what Democracy is to consist of after the anti-negro, anti-reconstruction, and antirepudiation planks are knocked out of their platform. They spurn and spit upon the resolutions adopted by the Pennsylvania and Ohio conventions; and they insist that these who would throw away what they deem the saving salt, or the centralized essence of Democracy, are mere time-serving placehunters. It is not only editors of the Brick Pomeroy school who adopt this course of reasoning, for many of the well-established local journals of the party in Pennsylvania strenuously insist upon continuing the fight against the constitutional amendments if it takes two or three centuries to make the proposed changes. Foolish as such a policy may appear, it is warmly endorsed by the man who, to a greater extent than any other single individual, is the intellectual leader of the Democracy of the United States. We mean Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia. Before secession he was their ablest parliamentary tactitian; in organizing the Confederacy, he boldly and logically defined its corner-stone to be human slavery; since the war he has assumed the position of expounder of the Constitution and of the true duties of the Democratic party; and now, in the midst of the new departure agitation, he has taken editorial charge of a leading Southern Democratic journal, for the purpose of showing that the reactionary and revolutionary Democratic platform of 1868 must be adhered to, because, as he alleges, "any departure from the essential principles of that platform will be exceedingly dangerous, if not fatal, to the liberties of the whole country. It will thus be seen that the new departure programme is encountering not merely the antagonism of ignorant and prejudiced voters in the rank and file of the Democracy, but that a large portion of its local leaders, and some of its ablest champions of national reputation, are so firmly wedded to the old idols that they are determined that Democracy shall be nothing if it is not reactionary. THE Washington Square property-holders are again in distress. Judge Thompson this morning refused the perpetual injunction asked for by three well-known real estate owners, who thought that the act of Legislature creating the Building Commission and providing for the selection of a site for the public buildings by the people of Philadelphia must be unconstitutional, for the reason that they, in event of the erection of the public buildings on Penn Square, would no longer be able to let out offices at the same remunerative rates as at present. The petition for the injunction was a very funny document, and it presented ample evidence of great distress of mind and pocket on the part of those who prepared it. We can well fancy that the judge laughed consumedly in the privacy of his office as he prepared the opinion-published in another columnwhich adds another burden of despair to the souls and pocket-books of the unhappy anti-Fenn Squareites. The weakness of the petition proved to what extremities the owners of real estate in the neighborhood of Washington Square have been reduced; and we are really curious to knew what will be their next movement for the purpose of defeating the wishes of the people of Philadelphia for the erection of the public buildings at the intersection of Broad and Market streets. That the anti-Penn Squareites will now cease from agitation and calmly accept the situation the experiences of the past for-bid ns to hope, and they undoubtedly have several pleasant surprises still in store for us that will serve for mild excitement during the hot season. 2005 82.2 ONE of the great Napoleon's methods of con-ciliating his army was to hold out the hope of becoming a marshal or at least a general to every soldier, and Napoleon the Little, as the devout insitator of his uncle, pursued a somewhat aimitiar policy. Other generals and rulers of States have adopted various methods of securing the allegiance of the military, but none of them ever hit upon anything quite as original as the plan of M. Thiers for placing himself en rapport with the bayonets of France. He has presented each regiment with a copy of his "History of the Consulate and the Empire," thus probably getting off his hands a large number of time furnishing the defenders of the last brand new republic with a record of heroic deeds which may excite them with a desire to live and die for the aged historian of the achievements of French soldiers in the days when Frenchmen had the knack winning victories, and the conof structor of the fortifications of Paris which were considered impregnable until the Germans a few months ago proved the contrary. M. Thiers' work, however, is usually considered to be rather eulogistic of the first Napoleon, and of his military and civil policy, and it may well be doubted whether, under all the circumstances, it is the best literary pabulum that can just at present be furnished to French soldiers. As it is more than likely, however, that a vast majority of the braves who compose the regiments of the French army are unable to read, it is possible that no great harm will be done, but that the regimental copies of M. Thiers' works will be looked upon as the soldiers of the first republic and first empire looked upon the eagles that had been presented by Napoleon I. M. Thiers has now only to go a step further, and to offer a copy of his history as a reward of merit to such soldiers as are specially distinguished for gallant conduct, and he may excite such emulation in the ranks of the army that he will be able not only to resist the payment of the German indemnity but to march his troops across the Rhine, and before the gates of Berlin avenge the woes of France and retrieve the disgrace of Paais.

LOUIS BLANC has written a letter declaring that the Republican party, hitherto a force, must become a power. Just so; but how is it to be done? Epigrams are not bad things in their way, and they often express great truths more forcibly than elaborate dissertations will do, but the writing of epigrams is not the best or most important thing to be done in the way of promoting great political reform movements; and if the republicans of Europe ever expect to do anything in the way of winning the support of the solid, practical common sense citizens, they will be obliged to moderate their propensity to make pompous declarations and do something to show that society would be better and happier if their principles were to prevail. The fine words of Louis Blanc, Victor Hugo, and other universal republicans will do very little in the way of making republicanism a power, so long as they have nothing better to show as the result of their teachings than the blackened ruins of Paris; and the people of Europe may well be shy of following the lead of blatherskites who invariably prove incompetent for the management of affairs whenever an opportunity is afforded them to put their theories into practice. The Republican party in Europe can become a power if its members will only agree upon what they desire to accomplish and then pull together, but republicanism will be a failure, and will deserve to be, so long as those who profess to be the leaders of the great movement for the emancipation of mankind only employ themselves in stirring up such disturbances as those which have resulted in the destruction of the historical buildings of Paris, and then get out of the reach of danger as fast as they can when the riot commences. The pronunciamentos of Louis Blanc or Victor Hugo will do about as much towards making the Republican party a power as those of Wendell Phillips and George Francis Train will towards convincing the people of the United States that their system of government is a failure and a fraud because the great American blatherskites profess to be able to evolve something better out of the depths of their inner consciousness.

DRY GOODS.

THE president of the Honeybrook Coal Company, Mr. J. B. McCleary, has been notified by telegraph this morning that the miners employed by that company have signed a contract based upon the offer of the Lehigh operators made on the 24th of February last, thus adding another to the number of collieries that have resumed in the region during the week. The product of the works belonging to the Honeybrook is fifteen hundred tons daily.
