AN ODE.

THE EFFECTS OF SPRING.

REMOTE from noise, in skies serene, Old TAUNTON'S cloud-capt spires ascend, The hills are cover'd o'er with green, And blossoms make the forests bend.

Tho' fools contest, and bigots rave, Bright reason yet directs the soul, While some, just tott'ring o'er the grave, Seem quite impatient of controul.

Let satyr keen, and wit refin'd, Transmute enjoyment into pain, Till reason stimulates the mind To court philosophy again.

Here heav'n-taught science rears her head, And labor marks the road to wealth, While social mirth, by fancy led, Establishes convenient health.

Here too, on pleasure's airy tide, We court the muses in the shade, Or on the ambient waters glide, To see the glimm'ring landscape fade.

Amusement oft at evening hours, Impels the rustic swain to rove In search of pinks and sweetest flowers, To deck the bosom of his love.

Enamour'd there he drops his head, In vain he courts forbidden blifs; And tho' he fails her charms to wed, He now and then purloins a kiss.

Our cattle in the forests stray, Our lambkins bound the meadows o'er, Their gambols round their mothers play, And vultures kindle fear no more.

Since herrings came our streams to trace, Health sparkles on the damsel's cheeks, She lures on shore the finny race, While rapturous joy her bosom speaks.

She takes the victim by the tail, And bends her footsteps to her home; And as she winds along the vale, She cries—"the herring tribe is come!"

Now pleasure darts in ev'ry eye, Each bosom glows with fervent heat; The fainting more than gain supply, The wretched quit their dark retreat.

The limping fire his crutch forgoes, His wither'd limbs revive in bloom; He throws aside his bag of woes, Nor yet salutes the fullen tomb.

O SPRING! thou happiest scene of man, Push on thy blessings through the year!— O let it end—as it began, Without a sigh—without a tear!
