It was in the late spring-time The merry month of May. Twas in the halls of learning. And many eyes were there ; Some set in faces homely, And some in faces fair. When all the rest had ended. In answer to the call, Came William Lee before us, The honored one of all.

Well, well do I remember. Five summers more had fled, The spring flowers all had faded The summer flowers were dead. But there bloomed, within our home, Beneath affection's shade, A flower-our own dear Emma-We hoped, not soon to fade. And Willie Lee had won her The one so lov'd and dear, And their wedding day was set "Upon the glad New Year." Well, well do I remember,

A few more years had flown, And Emma's check had faled, Its roseate hue was gone. I sat me down beside her. And asked the cause of grief, With a very saddened voice And answer very brief, She told me that her husband Had lost his self control-The rum-fiend, in his body, Had veil'd his once true soul.

Well, well do I remember, Another year had flown-Emma's name and age were cut Upon a marble stone. And coming from the grave-yard, A being staggered by-Ruin smitten on his face And demon in his eye. And I heard a little boy Sav, "Susie, don't you see There goes that drunken follow The rowdies call Bill Lee."

Then well did I remember. When first he raised to sup. Th' wine which maiden hand had pour'd Into the tempting cup. Before he drank he asked her, If he might be excused ; Smiling brightly, "no," she said "I will not be refused." So from that cup th' bright ey'd boy, The lov'd and honored youth, Drank poison, and forsook at once The path of hope and truth. ALTOONA, May 1863.
