There are good and bad men among them and for this reason; the Democracy of districts should guard against all imposition or flattery. Let them elect their delegates fairly, and let those delegates be tried and true men. This is important, because we must have a ticket personally strong, and when the delegates come together calmly to deliberate on such a selection they will be more able to canvas the claims of tatives. Good ann do not aspire to worldly candidates as they present themselves; for nomination. There is abundant material in the county, out of which to form a strong ticket; there are men unspoken of, but thought of by many whose claims could be then discussed so that we need not turn aside, to be entrapped by the designing and aspiring, and regret when too late that we have been deceived. This fostering care of politics. The commoner wedge of his afford parties of a few has been the curse of Centre ounty, and has cost her people more treasure, than ever will be known.
