Selected Poetry.

Stragling Thoughts. BT EDGAR A. POE.

Come let us ramble in the fields, And listen to the song. That's breathed upon the passing winds From natures myriad throng; For beautiful the landscape smiles The blushing flowers lend, Their odors to the gentle breeze,

In great profusion-blend...... Come let us ramble where the gorgeous, Gentle rippling till, Rolls trickling down its mossy banks, Along the rising hill;

We'll listen to its plaintive moan, And solve the pregnant thought ' Meandering, murmuring silvery stream, Flow on and be forgot.

We'll ramble till the ev'ning tints, Glow on the azure deen. When wooing zephyrs kiss the brow; The world it sinks to sleep; For soon the levely rosy beams, That linger in the sky. Will vanish into steel clad hues Sublimely to the eye!

Day's ebbing 'ide soon flows from earth The sunbeams pass away. These are but monitors that change On all things writes decay ! Tis then thought wings its downy flight, Into the dreamy past, And o'er times ever changing laws

Is meditation cast. We love to dwell upon the theme. Which nature thus inspires : For who can cast a single thought Unless he too admires, The majesty, the life, the power,
