Original Poetry. A Hundred Years Hence. BY KATE REESE

When a century more have rolled away, The birds will sing as sweet as to day ; O, yes, they will chant as loud and free, But not for us their wongs will be

Ponderous ships will gaily sail , But over our dust will sweep the gale, That will float them over the briny tide Of sceap's bosom deep and wide

Balmy winds will tan the flowers, But nonp of their odor will be ours; Gentle rains will full tog the ground, But we'wiff not hear one single sound

The sun his flery car will roll, Through the upper deep from pole to pole The suiting moon will traver through, The skies wide canvass tinged with blue

The stars will twinkle just as bright But not on us will fall their light,-For e're a hundred years have fied, We all will slumber with the dead FILLNORR PA
