A Glance at the People

It is a mistake among writers, professing attachment to Republican institutions to underrate the capacity of the people. A little observation in this respect, will enable comprehensive thinker is at no loss to discover the causes of this peculiarity, and to forsee that it is a radical mistake. There is no more common error than the self counit of those who think themse'ves wiser than oth ers, because they may possess more wealth liberal education. We believe, that it does not follow that a vaste income, or a collegiate course renders a man better qualified to decide correctly in political matters, than a the evidences of our free institutions are that what may be properly called the "masses," are not composed of ignorant boors, but intelligent, enterprising practical thinking men. We are inclined to think this class of people the bone and sinew of the land who claim greater advantages. There can be no question, but professional classes often come to the consideration of questions of vital importance, with minds more or less prejudiced by a one-sided education. Whatever anti-Republican feeling exists in the country, (by Republican we design to be understood as having no reference to the principles of modern Black Republicans.) is men, who have risen to wealth and promineace, very rapidly from the humble walks social atmosphere in which they have been surrounded, and their anti-Republican characteristics, perhaps traced to the current of innate principles of mind, which no educa- and others owing horses tion could effectually cradicate

But on the office hand the " masses" have neither aristocratic sympathics, nor are they the Fiston Bink, at Ession Pa , and squear imbaed from early life with vicious notions of political economy. ## Post Office Appropriation.

The defeat of the Post Office appropriation friends everywhere else ; they have a comparative right to the privilege; and any deficiency that may arise, either by the increase of paying matter, is as justly chargable to the Treasury, as any other expense. It is folly to attack the postal system, and thereby injure or derange the great circument be reduced to the same level.

Private enterprise and competition would with you. no doubt largely reduce the rates of letter postage between large cities, if open to such speculation, but the result would be burthensome to the great body of the republic, while many would be almost entirely cut off

The history of the defeat of the post office appropriation should be clearly understood. as it exhibits a factious spirit on the part of members, to say the loast disgraceful.
