It was stated that a Radical Congressional committee or delegation waited on Mr. Lincoln, and urged the removal of Gen. - from the command-in-chief, assigning as a reason that he was in the babit of drinking too much whiskey. Ahl! said Mr. Lincoln, "and do you know where he gets his whiskey, gentlemen?"

"No, we do not." "I'm sorry for that," was the Presideat's reply, "for if you could tell me, I would send a barrel of that same whiskey to every general in the army.'

The President, last night, in response to the direct questions of several Congressmen, declared that he was opposed to all constitutional amendments until the Southern members were in their seats, and so the South can have a voice in the matter. He said the question of representation was a small matter and that the North could well afford to overlook the tho-fifths advantage which the South now had, because emigration and kinkred causes would soon remedy it without, legislation. If the matter must be asked how they proposed to get such an amendment through the South. The reply was, "In the same way, Mr. President, that you got the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery through, by a little Presidential pressure." Mr Johnson replied that he saw no similarity between the two cases. In regard to the test oath, he said he was inclined to
