Goorge and Jasin listen to The tale I must unfold to you Of schoolmates four we used to be There's living now-but you and me

We meet when summer winds swept ore th the plains And sheaves were bound of golden grain And parted when octobers blast Had a yellow shade o,er the ferest cast

You parted there with one you,il meet no more For John is dead! He's left the shore

Of time and earthly toil and pain And you-ne, or will meet with him again I sawhim lay on his couch of pain While the Peaver fed upon his brain

I gave to him my last Good-by. Then turned away to see him dye While he lay on his seach of pain "No telling when we,ll most again" Were the last words I heard him say

As I turned from him and went away Twas hard to bid him deaths farewell His many schoolmates; kind and, dear

On earth nomore they,il ment him here His school mates bore him to the grave We laid him low in the narrow cave Then turned away while the sexton press' The cold earth down on our schoolmates

Beneath the sod he's laid to rest The winter snows sweeps e'er his breast And of the schoolmates four we used to be Their's living now but you and me

From the West. Already the political campaign has commenced; already the champions of the great civil issues of the day have taken sicles and are meeting each other in open combat. Stanching firm on the foundation of our federal system of government, resolutely cleaving to the shattered elements of American Liberty the stanch supporters and advocates of constitutional authority are proclaiming the principles of Democracy with intreptd boldness and unremitting energy. The campaign of eighteen hundred and sixty eight will prove one of momenteus consequences. It is a campaign on the issues of which are suspended the perpetuity of our republican form of government; the continuation of sovreign power vested in the hands of the people; the preservation of civil rights and political freedom and the security of national honor and integrity. There have been other campaigns when great and important questions were to be decided .-Questions that affected the peace and prosperity of our country but they were decided in times when statesmen labored for the good of the country instead of parties and however unwisely decided their ultimate results would prove but temporary.
