Sow few men seem to have formed a conception of the original dignity of nature, or the exalted design of their oreation. Regarding themselves only as orestures of time, endowed only with animal passion and intellectual facultion, the projects, aims and expectations wee oircumscribed by the narrow outlines of human life. They forget that inabilta and decay are written, as with a sunthe sam, upon all caribly objects—that this world, with all its pageactry, pomp and power, is erumbling into dust—that this life is scarcly deserving of a single chought, excepting it forms the introduction to another, and that he alone acts a prudent or rational part, who freces his plans with direct reference to that future and endless state of being.

How little do they know themselves! The soul is not of the earth, and they still strive in wain to chain it to the dust. Though its etrength is impaired, and its purity tarnished, and its "glory chained," it will not always be a prisoner here.
