

HUNTED UNTO DEATH.

Two individuals stood together under the trees beside a rancho on the outskirts of a Texan settlement. One a young girl in the flush of youth and beauty, with glorious dark hair and sparkling eyes, and the other a young man in the garb of a Texan ranchero. A dark browed, heavily bearded man, with a look in his face which was not apt to win the confidence of his kind, he was standing with his right arm thrown across the saddle of a beautiful mustang of a coal black hue, with only one white mark to relieve it, and that was a single white hoof.

"So you cast me off do you?" he said savagely. "I warn you to be careful. It isn't that I threaten you, Madge Wilson, because I could do you no harm, if I tried; but there are those who care for who may be made to suffer."

"What do you mean, Clare?" she said, in an eager tone. "You know that if I loved you, or there was any hope that I ever could love you, I would not tell you to leave me. It is better so, Clare Seaman, far better. You have been a good friend to me; and I am only surprised that you should care for a volatile, trifling girl such as I am."

"I came too late, it seems," he replied, preparing to mount his horse. "Clare Seaman is not a fool, and no one who has done this wrong, James Tracy."

The sudden hate with which he spoke the name could proceed only from an intensely bitter heart. He stooped, and tightened the heavy spur upon his right foot, and then bounded into the saddle.

"Don't think that I shall forget this," said he, as he said, "James Tracy; do you repeat his name?" she said, "I shall never forget you."

"I choose to take it," replied the other, quietly, as he soothed the mustang which was eager to go.

"I don't think he has done me wrong, and I do not, it is only because we have a different opinion of the young man's good day."

He rode hard for two hours, and at noon halted at a tavern in the little settlement, where he fastened his horse and went into the bar room. There he remained over an hour, drinking freely and boasting of his prowess. Half a dozen men who were in the bar room, drinking, smiled, and whispered among themselves that Clare Seaman was "hall to day."

After a while he rose, and went out to the green in front of the house, where a party of young men were "pitching quoits."

Among them was a tall young fellow, with an open, jovial face, who took the lead in the game, laughing heartily when he pitched.

"Come on," he cried, "Come on, I'll beat any man in this country."

It was James Tracy, the young man whom Clare had spoken so bitterly to Madge Wilson.

"You can't beat any one, Tracy," replied Seaman, in a surly tone. "You care too much of yourself in every way."

"Do I, Clare?" Well it don't matter, so long as I can beat I understand it. "You may win too much for your own good, one of these days," replied Clare, fiercely. "You had better take care."

"I see," said James, replying to a whisper of one of the men. "I did not notice it before, or I would not have asked him to pitch."

"Away, boys," said the old man, savagely. "Hunt down the murderer, and give him frontier justice. You know how."

In ten minutes every available man was in the saddle, and on the trail of the flying murderer, each one eager to be the man to bring him down.

"Suppose we catch him alive, Jake?" said a young man, who rode by the side of the grizzled ranger who had taken charge of the affair, and who had served through all the Texan wars, under name Ben McCullough.

"Take him alive? No need to do that I reckon. But if we do—" He touched significantly the coil of lariat which hung at the pommel of his saddle.

Meanwhile the flying man began to understand that there was something wrong with his horse. He halted in his pace, and staggered under the weight of his rider. Bowing forward, Clare Seaman saw a line of blood behind his shoulder; and a small round orifice from which the dark tide was slowly streaming. One of the bullets had hit him, and, just as they reached the verge of a great wood, he fell, nearly falling on his rider. Seaman bounded to his feet, and buried himself in the thicket, just as the foremost of the pursuers came in view. It was impossible to force their horses through the thicket; and, dismounting hastily, they took their rifles and broke through the tangled brake and thick underbrush, stumbling over logs fast going to decay, splashing through stagnant pools, and running brooks—eager, remorseless, as man is apt to be when he hunts human game. For this was the game they sought today—a painting, pale face, wretched running desperately onward, caring nothing for the branches and low hanging branches which tore the skin from his face, and left long, ragged furrows upon it. Behind him and on each side rose the shouts of pursuing men, and their tones spoke nothing but desperate hate. It was a wild country, in which civil law had very little hold. The men who committed crime within their borders suffered punishment at the hands of that most stern of all magistrates, "Judge Lynch."

This was the law of Texas in '56, and, in the herding districts, this is the law of Texas today.

"Hunted like a beast of the forest," the man paused a moment in a sheltered dell, worn out, and gasping for breath. His wild eyes roved from side to side, hoping to find some avenue of escape, yet hearing those wild cries and stern commands from his many foes—A hundred men were in the woods around to the north, and ready to shoot him down at a moment's warning, each eager to be the one to execute judgment upon him! He had almost reached the open prairie, but when there, what hope was left for him? Without a horse, he would be speedily brought to bay by his pursuers, who followed him so savagely.

He went on at a rapid pace, and, just as he reached the edge of the cover, he heard the rapid beat of coming hoofs, and his heart sank within him, for he feared that some of his enemies had made the circuit of the woods, and cut him off from the plain. Then he decided that but a single horseman was here, and as he could strike him down and take his horse, escape was yet possible. Now that blood was on his hand he did not hesitate to shed more, and the hunt with which he grasped his bowie knife did not tremble, as he waited for the coming of the horseman.

Creeping cautiously forward, he could see the form of the horse, now standing motionless at the verge of the thicket, and, rising suddenly, he sprang out with uplifted knife ready for a blow—Why does he hesitate and stagger back, covering his face with his hands? It is no grizzled ranger who stands before him, but Madge, with pale face and wild eyes, regarding him with a mingled look of horror and pity.

"Oh, Clare, Clare, how could you do it? Your hands are red with the blood of your brother, and like Cain you must wander forth alone."

"I didn't mean to do it," replied Seaman, hoarsely. "The weight was in my hand, and I struck him before I thought. Have some pity, Madge; it was for your sake I did it."

"Take my horse," she said, "upon condition that you leave Texas forever. Do not thank me, for I do it not for your sake, but for the sake of the man you have murdered, and because I think that you will suffer more than if your pursuers cut you down to-day. James Tracy would have done as I do."

He sprang into the saddle, and rode hard until he placed a thick island of timber between him and the woods which yet shrouded his enemies, while Madge turned back, sick at heart, toward her home. On the way she met a negro boy riding at the top of his speed, who pulled up as he saw her.

"Oh, Miss Madge; got good news. Master Tracy he no die, doctor say."

Madge turned deadly pale, and was not able to speak for a moment, and then laid her hand upon the bridle of the horse, nervously herself to do it.

"Get down, Pomp; I want this horse. Don't hesitate a moment."

The boy sprang down, and she took his place and rode to cut off the pursuers of Clare, who had already emerged from the woods, and were scattered over the plain. She remembered that she had left in the holsters of her saddle an elegantly mounted pistol, loaded. As she neared the woods, in the shelter of which she had seen Seaman disappear, she heard a single pistol-crack, and, breaking through the bushes, saw

Clare Seaman lying on the soil, she thought the heart. Hemmed in by his enemies, hopeless of escape, he had committed the crime for which there is no atonement, and lay dead in the short prairie grass.

Years after, when James Tracy and Madge were man and wife, they stood together on the spot where they made the grave in which Clare Seaman lies. And above it a little marble slab bore his name and age.

A Corpse Driving a Horse Through Nashville.

The Nashville, (Tenn.) Banner, of the 7th, says: Dr. William Burdett, who resided at 339 S. Cherry street, died at 6 o'clock last evening under the most peculiar circumstances. About half an hour previous to his demise he had driven to the residence of conductor Edward Wells, near the Decatur depot, who lay very ill of inflammatory rheumatism. After leaving some instruction with his patient, he got into his buggy and started his horse homeward.

Sudden death, like a stroke of lightning, overtook him probably before he had driven more than a hundred yards, and the late living, speaking human being, who, a few moments before had talked calmly and quietly, after his usual manner, to a patient, and his patient's family, and had even joked with a little boy whom he met by the street side as he entered his buggy, still sat stark and stiff upright upon his seat, the reins clutched in his hands, staring eyes looking out upon the street, driving homeward a corpse.

Later of us all, what was it that those who met the horse and vehicle saw in the face of the driver that made them shudder and hurry on a little faster? Death looked out from those lifeless eyes, and it was he who guided the unknowing horse, plodding on toward his late master's door, and there who looked into that vacant face, something so fatal and indelibly which made them shudder, perhaps, and hasten involuntarily forward. The horse drew up at the familiar hitching post, but no master descended, and he stood gently pawing the ground, anon jerking the lines, but he got no answer to these signals, however oft repeated.

No familiar voice, which had so often cheered or cheered him in long journeys. Then he pricked his ears and jerked the reins a little harder, and his head, but there was no response, save the grating of the leather over the dash board. What could it all mean? And now Mrs. Burdett looks out of the window, and says, "Well I declare the doctor's come, but why don't he get out?" She looks a moment, but he doesn't move, and she says, "perhaps he wants something," and then she trips out to the street, looks up into the buggy and says, "Well, William, what is it?" No answer. And then she bends forward a little and the light, shines fuller on the figure there. Is it her husband? But the face is livid and the eyes blindly staring. "William, oh, William!" and she grasped him by the hands, still clutching the reins; they are cold and stiff; he is dead.

Through the assistance of several gentlemen, Dr. Burdett's body was taken into the house, where Coroner Brown held an inquest over his remains. The jury returned a verdict that he came to his death from disease of the heart.

Notice to Tobacco Consumers. The following, prepared by a dealer in tobacco, who has kept himself as well posted on the regulations as his ability to learn will admit of, is of interest to consumers.

It is said that it is intended to petition Congress to pass the following law affecting tobacco consumers this winter.

Tobacco chewers are requested to get their tobacco from first hands, that is the first man you meet who will give you a chew.

Where parties are in the habit of borrowing chews, the government will furnish each man with a note book, in which the time of day, the size of the quid, whether plug or fine cut, the quality, and time when the amount is to be refunded, must be strictly recorded.

Those persons who have been innocently deceived by a cheap tobacco will call on the dealer who sold them the tobacco, and give him as near as possible, the amount which they believe has been consumed. The officer will then furnish necessary stamps, and if they are chewed up in his presence the government is then satisfied that no criminal wrong was meant.

Those persons who maliciously carry two boxes, one filled with base smoking tobacco, to give to borrowers, the other containing superb fine cut for home consumption, are to be treated as deserving of death, and hung on the spot.

No tobacco-box must have more than two spigot holes in it, and the stamp must be pasted directly over these.

When a quid has been exhausted, the government strictly forbids it being thrown away until two red chalk marks have been made across it, and a label attached bearing these words: "The fellow who has chewed this has complied with all the requirements of the law, and persons are hereby warned not to chew this quid again."

Tobacco consumers must constantly bear in mind that the more stamps there are on a package of tobacco—the cheaper does the weed become—in a horn.

The government strictly forbids the use of tobacco-boxes having a concealed needle in the knob on the cover, by which one might stab his neighbor, or a chew after having the instrument run into his thumb about a foot.

An anti-kissing society has been formed by the Galena, Illinois girls. "No kissing before marriage." is their motto.

Helmbold's Column.

HENRY T. HELMBOLD'S Compound Fluid Extract of CATAWBA GRAPE PILLS.

Compound Fluid Extract of Catwaba and Grape Pills, for the cure of all the diseases of the urinary organs, such as Catarrh, Hematuria, Stricture, etc. Purely Vegetable, containing no mercury, or other deleterious drugs.

These Pills are the most delightfully pleasant purgative suppository ever out, salts, magnesia, etc. There is nothing more acceptable to the stomach. They give tone, and cleanse the bowels, and are composed of the finest ingredients. After a few days' use of them, such an invigoration of the entire system takes place as to appear in the face of the patient, and the urine, which arises from impurities or disease of the urinary organs, ceases to appear.

Helmbold's Compound Fluid Extract of Catwaba Grape Pills are not sugar coated, from the fact that sugar coating is not only unnecessary, but passes through the stomach without dissolving, consequently do not produce the desired effect. THE CATAWBA GRAPE PILLS, being pleasant in taste, and easy to take, do not necessitate their being sugar-coated. Price fifty cents per box.
