Medical.

RHEUMATISM is believed to be caused by excess of lactic acid in the blood, owing to the failure of the kidneys and liver to properly remove it. The acid attacks the fibrous tissues, particularly in the joints, and causes the local manifestations of the disease, pains and aches in the back and shoulders, and in the joints at the knees, ankles, hips and wrists. Thousands of people have found in Hood's Sarsaparilla a positive and permanent cure for rheumatism. This medicine, by its purifying and vitalizing action, neutralizes the acidity of the blood, and also builds up and strengthens the whole body.

WONDERFUL PROPERTIES. "I have taken Hood's Sarsaparilla and found it excellent for rheumatism and dyspepsia. I suffered for many long years, but my complete recovery is due to Hood's Sarsaparilla. I recommend it to every one because of its wonderful properties as a blood medicine." JOHN KULMAN, 85 Chatham Street, Cleveland, Ohio.

"I hereby certify that I have been affected with chronic rheumatism, accompanied by serious disorder of the liver and stomach. For more than ten years past, during which time I have been treated by various physicians and have used almost every medicine that has been recommended me for such disease, without finding any relief whatever, until I tried Hood's Sarsaparilla. This has done me more good than any thing else that I have ever taken, and I take pleasure in recommending it in the highest terms. It has been worth its weight in gold to me." One Man's Wedding Night.

Devoted Mainly to Disturbing the Rest of the 'Squire who Tied the Knot.

Wednesday morning, as Justice Griswold was opening his office, a well-dressed man walked up to him and with some hesitation said: "If I come back in about an hour will you tie a knot for me?" The 'Squire comprehended, at once what he meant and told the would-be benedict that if he wanted a marriage ceremony performed he could accommodate him. The stranger said that was the situation, and a few minutes later took his departure. At about 9 o'clock he returned with a lady, who appeared to be about 25 years old, and when the couple left the office they were made man and wife.

The 'Squire thought nothing more of the occurrence, but at about 11 o'clock Wednesday night some one rang the door bell at his house, 985 Cedar avenue in a very vigorous manner. Every one about the house had retired, but after a little the dignified Justice appeared, robed in white, and bade the late comer announce himself.

"I am the man you married to-day, and I want to see you right away on an important business," came a voice on the outside. "Squire Griswold opened the door and invited the man to enter. "My wife has left me and taken $500 of my money," blurted out the newcomer. He was told to explain himself, and after a little hesitancy said: "My name is Lockhard and I live in Indiana. I came to this city to testify in a suit for damages brought against the Valley Railroad. While here I became acquainted with Miss Rose Dain, and after a little courtship I proposed and was accepted. Then we were married by you. Directly after the ceremony I was called to give testimony in the Common Pleas Court. My wife and I had arranged to leave for my home as soon as the case was finished, and before leaving her I gave her $500 with which to make some purchases. I was on the witness stand seven hours, but the minute I was excused I went in search of my bride. She was not at her boarding house, and the landlady said that she went away about 11 o'clock in the morning and took her trunk. Now," he continued, "what can I do? My wife is gone and she has got my money."

"Have you endeavored to find her?" inquired the Justice. "Yes, but I don't know where to look," replied the husband of a day. "Well, what do you want of me?" queried 'Squire Griswold. "Why, I thought you would swear out a warrant for her arrest," said Lockhard. "That will keep until morning," answered the Justice, "and I want to go to bed."

Mr Lockhard took the hint and departed immediately. Justice Griswold turned off the gas and sought his bed, but he was not destined to have a long nap. At about 3 o'clock the door bell rang and a man came in. The 'Squire afterwards said that something told him Lockhard was at the other end of the bell wire, and he was, therefore, not greatly surprised upon opening the door to be confronted by the newly married Hoosier. Nevertheless he was not prepared to meet two police officers and a sobbing woman, and was startled when the quartet filed into the hall.

"This woman says she is not my wife spoke up Lockhard. "Yes," said one of the officers, "this man found her, and called upon us to take her to the police station. She was willing enough to go, but declared that she was willing enough to go, but declared that she was some mistake. At the Fourth precinct police station Lieut. Thompson thought that we had better come here and settle the matter."

The 'Squire put on his eyeglasses, turned up the gas, and then looked at the woman critically. Without hesitation he said: "I married this couple yesterday morning." "I never saw you before in my life," answered the woman promptly. "I already have one husband, what do I want of another?" This appeared to astonish Lockhard, and he reproached the woman in bitter language. "I don't know you, sir," she replied, haughtily. "Give me back my money and I will agree not to prosecute you," almost shouted the now nearly frantic man. The woman regarded the speaker with disdain but did not reply. Justice Griswold made some remark about the interview coming to a close and the party left. That is the last the 'Squire saw of Lockhard or his bride.

When approached by a reporter Lieut. Thompson, of the Fourth precinct police station, said: "I believe that the couple came to a settlement. After Lockhard, the woman and the officers returned from Justice Griswold's house, and I learned without a doubt that the woman was Lockhard's lawful wife, I was disposed to arrest her, but he did not appear to desire that, and begged of the woman to give him his money and acknowledge herself his wife. She obstinately refused to do this, but finally he persuaded her to take a walk with him, and they returned in about fifteen minutes, and he announced that everything was all right and that his wife had been laboring under a mistake. They went away together, and Lockhard appeared to be as happy as though nothing had happened.

"How old was Lockhard?" asked the reporter. "He appeared to be 45 years, and he was fine looking," replied the Lieutenant. "He told me that this was his first experience in marrying, and further assured me that it would be the last."

Nothing more could be learned concerning the affair. Where the bride lived or what her antecedents are could not be discovered. Lockhard is a railroad man, and it is said, is quite wealthy. It is believed that he has returned to Indiana with his wife.

American railroads would reach half way to the moon, says a statistician.

The Woodpecker's Store House.

While walking through the Museum of Natural History at Central park recently I saw in one of the glass cases part of a cedar telegraph pole thickly perforated with holes. On inquiry I learned that these holes had been dug in the pole by the California woodpecker, for the purpose of storing acorns for its winter food. Some of the acorns may still be seen in the pole, although most of them had been extracted before it was cut down.

It has been known that these busy workers store acorns in the bark of standing trees, but the use of a telegraph pole for this purpose is an entirely new selection, and while perhaps the feathered friend find it a very convenient storehouse, their method of taking possession is decidedly damaging to the telegraph pole.

There is a cousin of this same bird in Mexico who has discovered that the stalk of the alopecurus makes a much better storehouse than trees or telegraph poles, beside saving him a great deal of labor. The alopecurus after flowering dies, but the hollow stalk remains standing. The flinty texture of the stalk is easily pierced through to the central cavity by the woodpecker, who then thrusts in an acorn, then another and another until the space is filled to the level of this hole.

He then makes a second opening higher up and thrusts in more acorns until the level of that hole is reached. So he proceeds all the way up the stalk until it is completely filled with acorns. Often alopecurus stalks distant from the nearest oak tree have been found stored in this way, involving a journey for the birds of sixty miles for each acorn stored.

All this good work is turned to use in times of famine, when not only the woodpeckers but other birds and even animals live on the preserved food.—St. Nicholas.

A Horse That Sold Well.

It was not long ago that a certain good man who lives in one of these two cities, says the Lewistown Me. Journal, bought a horse—a handsome horse, fair in form and flesh, energetic in spirit and good driver. He enjoyed his horse for a week. One night the horse lay down and in the morning would not get up.

The stall was narrow and they had to tear down one half of it in order to lift the beast. Once up, he was all right and went well for a week at the end of which time he again became tired and was found unconditionally rebound. Unfortunately, he was upon the other side, and they had to tear down the other side of the stall. This thing occurred yet again a week later, and this time the man led himself forth on a tour of discovery. The man who had sold him the horse had the same trouble but had "forgotten" to speak about it. So had the man before him, and so back through a succession of owners. As a last resort he took himself to an Auburn horse trader, and asked him to trade or sell or make way with the beast.

"Sell him!" ejaculated the horse man after the man had explained the peculiarities of his horse. "Sell him!" Well I guess I can sell him. The best horse I ever owned. Why I've sold him four times already and everybody has agreed not to find a word of fault if I only would sell him to some one else. "The horse was sold and is still supposed to be in the hand of the living hereabout, and in league with certain carpenters who tear down and build up horse stalls.

The Face at the Window.

"This letter is to my husband," she said as she licked on a stamp at the window in the corridor of the crowded postoffice. "Yes, m." "Will it go out to-day?" "Yes, m." "By first mail?" "Yes, m." "He ought to get it day after to-morrow?" "Yes, m." "And I ought to have his letter by next Saturday?" "Yes, m." "It isn't over weight?" "No, m."

"And if he gets it, and if I get his answer by Saturday I can write—" "Please don't obstruct the window, ma'am, there are forty people waiting."

"Oh, there are! That's always the way of it! I can't get a word of information out of this postoffice, for as I will. Good day, sir!"

It Wasn't Expensive.

It is at once entertaining, instructive, and as a book of reference it is invaluable. It costs you four dollars. Busy Man—Cheap, isn't it? Book Agent—Remarkably so, for a work of its character. Busy Man—I did not refer to the book. Book Agent—Excuse me. What did you refer to, sir? Busy Man—Talk.—Pack.
