Coyotes and Timber Wolves.

They Form One of the drawbacks to Farming in the Northwest.

Farming in the northwest has certain drawbacks unknown to other localities.

There is a certain annual loss of calves and colts from the attack of wolves. There are two kinds of these animals, the timber wolf and the coyote, of different habits, but of precisely similar gastronomic taste. The coyote usually hunts singly; the timber wolf, a larger and more formidable animal, is fond of society.

They are therefore much hunted, and various breeds of dogs have been im-ported for their benefit. But they are down through fashionable folly a score hesitancy to all being familiar ned in the comfast, cunning and stay well, and, hav-ing killed an animal and dined on him. as being nonand as being the they do not return to sup on him, but od of education, involving long hours look elsewhere. It is not therefore, so easy to find them. They post themselves on con-venient eminences and leave for parts unknown directly they observe a cowboy and dogs, no matter how far off he may be. They have no use for man. The timber wolves are very powerful animals, and when run by Scotch deer hounds either get into some small brush or seek a convenient place to turn at bay. The Scotch deer-hound then declines to hold closer converse with a stranger to whom he has not been introduced.

The boar hound, on the contrary, at once seeks to thoroughly investigate his new acquaintance, but he is a slow animal, for whose arrival the wolf can only be induced to wait by pressing attention on the part of the other dogs. Ranchers are now crossing several breeds of hounds to obtain speed, coupled with power. They have even tried crossing of wolves.

The new animal cheerfully hunts his vulpine kindred, but is not fast enough. Packs of hounds, more or less of foxhound relationship, have been tried, but it is found that when tired of running the wolf lies down, opens his mouth, and invites some one to come
