About the Brownies. Where They Came From and Who Adopted the

Who and what were the Brownies? and did Palmer Cox invent them? are questions that come to Mr. Cox from children all over the country. The Brownies were fairies or sprites who were believed to inhabit the forests of direction will be permitted within the Scotland long years ago; and Mr. Cox limit. chose them for his rhymes in preference to all other little people because they were such good little things, never mischievous or naugty like the greater part of Fairyland's diminutive population. The Brownies never showed themselves to men, never gave advice or charms, but went quietly about doing good, seeking out everyone in trouble in order to afford relief, Their work was accom-plished wholly during the night, for it was believed that should the sun shine upon them his rays would be fatal.

How did the artist discover what the little creatures looked like? He searched everywhere tor information, in all the musty old books he could find that contained accounts of fairies or fairy pictures; but of course there were no photographs of the Brownies, as no one had ever seen them; so he was obliged to make them according to his own idea of what a fun-loving, goodnatured, sprite might be. At first all the Brownies drawn by Mr. Cox were alike-round-faced, thin-legged little fellows, wearing pointed caps. Soon he began to introduce the different personages. The Irishman was the first new figure seen in the gay company, and in all the stories that followed, Mr. Cox continued to add new characters until the list has become almost full. Sometimes the characters would suggest themselves to him; sometimes an idea received from an admiring reader would be carried out. A few days after the verses in which the Brownie Indian appeared for the first time had been sent to press, the following queer request from a little chap in Dakota reached the artist:

Dear Mr. Cox--Please make Brownie Indian with feathers. To the little writer the feathers were the distinguishing mark of the Indians, for he lived among them, and was very familiar with their style of dress. When the boy discovered the Indian, made purposely to please him (he thought), and dressed in full war costume, with the desired feathers, his delight knew no bounds; and another letter was writhim to keep an eye on "the new member, because," explained the boy, "the Indian looks very savage, and might scalp the Dude and spoil his complexion." Another little boy, very fond of horses, wanted a jockey Brownie.

Very often little girls write to ask why there are no girl Brownies; they seem to consider themselves neglected -not finding anyone to represent them among their favorites. But tradition says there were no girl Brownies-another difference found between them and all other kinds of fairies. Notwith standing this fact, there is a little girl in Maryland who has been called for them, her real name being "Brownie."--January St. Nicholas.

Former Elephants.

Europe and the British Isles Once the Feeding Grounds of Huge Animals.

The great northern elephant perished as a species in the prime of life. It had lived under the most prosperous conditions. Its enemies were few and comparatively importent. Alone among contemporary animals, the saber-toothed tiger occasionally, perhaps, got the better of an antagonist which must have been less sensitive to the flint-tipped arrows of mere human assailants than Ship Surgeon Gulliver was to the multitudinous pricks of Lilliputian mis-

Mammoths wandered into Ireland and Scotland, they tramped by the score through the thickets of the world, they roamed in great herds along the flats and valleys of Central Europe and across the endless oak clad plains of Russia and the now barren trundras of Siberia. Italy reared elephants of its own (elephas meridionalis): another antique species of large size (elephas antiques), was met with from Yorkshire to the Atlas; even Malta swarmed with pigmy elephants of two, if not three, separate kinds, while the huge mastodon was the chief representatives of the genus in North and South

Horrible Holocaust in a Temple.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., Jan. 14.-The atest advices from Shanghai to Dec. 13, received vesterday by the steamer Peking, give details of an appalling calamity at Ningpo which resulted in the horrible death by fire of nearly 300 Chinese women and children, at a theatrical performance on Dec 8, in honor of the gods. Over 400 were present, the women and children being on the balconies of the two stories of the temple. A boy carelessly threw a cigarette, which he had been smoking, into a heap of straw at the foot of the stairs leading to the second story. The straw was dry and instantly blazed up, burning the staircase and thus cutting off all escape from the temple that was soon in ruins.
