Since trees absorb through their roots a great quantity of moisture, which passes through the trunk and the branches to the leaves, where it is partially evaporated, it follows that forests, by the foliage, act in a three-fold manner upon the climate. By the shelter which they offer, their evaporation and their reverberatory action towards the celestial spaces, they cause the dew so beneficial to plant life atter hot summer days.

The gaseous atmosphere which surrounds our globe to an approximate height of sixty miles, performs a most on. important service for plant and animal life; it is the great reservoir to which animals return the carbon which they exhale and from which the plants draw this element to be assimilated by them and return oxygen to be consumed anew by animals.

A Higher Scale of Life Has Demanded Increased Although the cost of living has been materially reduced in most articles of necessity and wages are much higher than they were thirty years ago the ma-jority of the people are but little better off financially. The reason is to be found in the higher scale of living which is to be met to retain any social position. Thirty years ago men in moderate circumstances thought themselves well off with living rooms furnished plainly and simply; the chambers with enameled bedsteads and chairs and plain linen and plated silver througout. This is all changed and the living rooms must copy as closely as possible the appurtenances and belongings of wealthy families. There is no enameled furniture for sale and where rag carpets were formerly thought good enough for ordinary use there are Brussels carpets, imitations of imported rugs and sorts of useless bric-a-brac that runs away with many a hardly earned dollar. All classes consume and enjoy a great deal more they formerly did, and everybody, rich,
