Nijni-Novgorod to St. Petersburg.

At Nijni (lower). Nov (new).

Gorod (town). I lived at the Grand hotel International, a veritable caravanserail, built of wood, demountable. Situated in a large, low, open space between the Fair and the Pan Russian Exposition, the long barracks-like buildings are supported on posts stuck in the mud, like the bath-houses at Atlantic City and converge like an open fan, to a common centre, the office, the cashier. The weather was bleak sad, rainy. It rained in on my bed. The bed covers, about as big as a bandana handkerchief were structurally defective to protect from the intemperate climate an able-bodied man, six feet three inches in stature. One end of the hotel I lived in was being demounted, by the simple process of unscrewing the boards, etc., to be transported to Tifflis. This is the evolution of Economy, &c.

> My guide was a Polish jew, from Warsaw, who had been one of Cooks "personal conductors" and was the owner of an aquiline nose of neo-gothic architecture, with a pedigree dating from the time of Moses. I was so absorbed in the contemplation and admiration of his nose, that I forgot to ask him his name.

Equipped in our waterproofs, he with felt knee boots we sallied out to see the sights. The commercial instincts of my guide led him to lead me to see the Fair, or rather where the Fair is held. for it was closed and the merchants had gone to seek their lares and penates, some in far off Siberia, others in Persia, Caucasia, Turkesstan. Oublique-eyed Tartars with shaved heads. little cap on back of the head and big floppy ears were painting the town; some had reached the Nirvana period others singing were following their leader who was playing an accordeon. Their typical dress is red blouse falling below the knee, blue trousers, felt knee boots. This is very becoming to their Asiatic type of features. The site of the fair is two or three times every year covered six to ten feet deep with water.

The Russians poetically say Mother Volga does not rise she simply spreads out to wash the face of Nature. Nijni normally has a population of 70,000, during the fair there are present frequently 500,000. July 15 the fair is officially opened lasts forty days closing August 25. During this time the town is under martial law, the governor-general being installed in the Glavny Dom, the principal building of the fair, which dominates the whole town, and is surrounded by a guard of soldiers, soldiers patrol every street of the fair. The governor has the power to arrest criminals and imprison or hang them without the have always had a weakness for this style formality of a trial.

The business done in these forty days is enormous, amounting to 500,000,000 roubles or more than $250,000,000.

More than 10,000 shops and warehouses are used to display the goods. Furs, iron, for my prolific use of what Emerson called grain, salt, hides, fish, leather, cotton goods and articles de Paris constitute the bulk of the merchandise sold. CAPILLARY ATTRACTION.

> Walking along the bank of the Oka, I dimly espied through the mist, an enormously long, three decked boat used as a hotel, and, on one of the decks, barbers at work cutting the moujik's hair. For this they have a system as practical as ever devised by the ingenious Yankee. A form is placed on the head like a cap and all the hair which projects outside of the cap is cut off, then the neck lathered and shaved. I watched the operation with the interest of an explorer after the new and useful, and one big moujik as blond as a field of ripe wheat, who had just submitted to the caworth the price.

THE PAN RUSSIAN EXPOSITION Architecturally the different buildings of the Pan Russian Exposition have a varied and nationally original appearance and consist principally of the modified Gothic and the Moorish. The Central Asian section was built in the Moorish style. I of architecture and have in mind some magnificent specimens of residences, of the true Moorish style in Pasco de Gracia, Barcelo-

It was the only genuine enthusiasm I had seen in Russia. The moujik has no part in government, no more than a Cuban has in the government of his island. His role is to plant his cabbage and to vegetate, like them. The Tchinovniks tell him how much tax he has to pay, his proportion of what the government assesses on the Mir.—the commune.

If the eye is the mirror of the soul, facial expression is certainly the thermometer of the intelligence. When you know that seven-tenths of the Russians cannot read, know nothing of passing events which make history, you have the explanation of their ox-eyed, hopeless, purposeless facial ex-

The moujiks appear patient in their misery, submissive in their suffering; it is impossible that they be contented. Without schools, there is no hope of bettering their condition.

May it please God and the Tsar; one God in Heaven, one Tsar on earth, are their expression of submission. For them the Tsar is the father as the earth is the mother.
