James Durst, living about three miles below town, had a very painful accident last week. He was holding a board with his knee and at the same time was driving a nail through it, when the nail struck the knee and penetrated it to the depth of about half an inch. The pain at once became exceedingly severe and grew to be almost unendurable. His limbs became stiff and cold, and lock-jaw was threatening. Dr. Alexander was summoned and succeeded in allaying the pain by injecting morphine.

Last Saturday night George Gardner's horse evidently tired of eating stake oats and suddenly left for home in the wee hours. But before it reached its destination it left the buggy by the side of a large tree. Mr. Gummo was up early for a trip to Stone valley and found the wandering horse and gave it comfortable quarters and forgot to tell any one. In the meantime the owner passed and repassed the stable, scouring the valley for Spruce creek to State College, and was about to give up the chase at dark when the beast was found about a mile away, and fortunately but little damage was done. Heretofore George blamed some clever fellow for tying his horse loose, causing him to hoof it every step home. But this was a clean break loose and a run away to boot. There are still some stables for rent.
