GRAVES AT ARLINGTON.

Historic Resting Place of Many of the Union's Dead Present Appearance of the Splendid Home Which General Robert E. Lee Left to Help the Southern Confederacy-Price Paid by the Government.

Arlington house and the fine estate of a thousand acres, which was the home of General George Washington's adopted son from 1802 to the time of his death-lies on the Virginia hills, just four miles from the capitol dome, at Washington as the crow To reach it you pass through quaint old Georgetown-its tumble-down mansions built a century ago, its narrow streets and old, old canal, and the dilapidated ware houses of a by-gone port; its great reservoir, and brand new power house of the electric railway, and smelt market, (in a double sense); its ancient Catholic university and community of priests and nuns and professors; its proud "First Families," and the historic cemetery where many more of the "F. F. V.'s" may be found; its swarms of smiling darkeys and mongrel curs, its frank squalor and happy-go-lucky poverty. All this is Georgetown, and a great deal more which can better be feltand smelled—than described.

Then you cross the long wooden bridge on top of the canal acqueduct, which spans the Potomac, where all is "quiet" to-day as during the weary months when Mc-Clellan's forces lay along the placid river, and then you are out of the District of Columbia and in Arlington house is situated at the highest point of the ridge which overlooks ington, so that a straight line drawn from its door step to the capitol building, would be about on a level with the plumed helmet of the Goddess of Liberty atop the dome, 339 feet above low-tide in the river. ing the mansion, are used for cemetery for a summer day's loitering. purposes. Why they are here it is impossible to understand. To be sure, there were "Belle Boyds' and female spies in the manufacture of the Marquis of Lansdowne, and another painted expressly for Martha Washington, of that description. Perhaps they were nurses in the hospitals around Washington, where they died of diseases contracted from the sick and wounded soldiers, or maybe they were "daughters of the regiment," have been those strange characters who shed the habiliments of their sex, donned the warrior's garb and marched, Amazon-like. to their graves. In either case the spirit of heroism was within them, and they deserve to slumber with the Grand Army. The colored troops, two or three thousand of them, are encamped by themselves in one corner, and, like their white companions-in-arms, the ma-jority went to glory from Virginia battlefields and Washington hospitals.

At length, wearied of interminable headstones, you turn to the left by some leafstrewn pathway under the memorial oaks, work southward up and down the gentle hills, cross two or three little creeks-al-

The central portion of the edifice is 60 feet square, with portion of the edifice is 60 feet square, with two wings each 40 feet square, giving a frontage of 140 feet. This is faced by a portico 25 feet deep, with eight magnificent Doric columns, 26 feet high, supporting its pediment. These figures convey no idea of the dignity and aristocratic pretensions of the place, nor of the air of snug comfort and good cheer which yet linger around the

this house was owned by Robert E. Lee at the time of the "late unpleasantness" and old regime as one may find in a week's that it was confiscated on account of his participancy in the rebellion is a mistaken one. General Lee never owned so much as a birch in its walls. It belonged to his wife, who was a Custis, and inherited it from George Washington Parke Custis, the from George Washington Parke Custis, the adopted son of our first President, and she only had a life interest in the estate, which, at her death, would have reverted to Gen. Custis Lee, the next descendant in line.

The Lee family occupied it till 1861, when they went south to cast their fortunes with Watertown, N. Y. they went south to cast their fortunes with the confederacy. In the following year it was taken as the military headquarters of Gen. McDowell, of the United States, and was occupied by the federal forces till '63, when it was sold by the government under the direct tax act of the sum of $65, over-the direct tax act of the su as the family was concerned. Finally

THE SUPREME COURT DECIDED THE CASE, In favor of the Lee heirs, whereupon a bill was introduced in the Senate by Edmunds, of Vermont, to pay Mrs. Lee the sum of $250,000 for the sum of $250,000 for the property. The bill was passed and the money was turned over to General Custis Lee, the heir-at-law under the will of his grandfather, as recorded in the Fairfax county court houseall but $20,000, which was retained by the government until the state of Virginia had been paid all taxes due. As will be seen, there was some injustice even in this, es-pecially after the direct tax law had been repealed, making the rightful owners of the place pay for it during the time it was forcibly held by other parties. The National cemetery was formally established by the government in 1867, upon 200 acres of the land. Besides the boys in blue, a few hundred who wore the gray are also buried here; and back of the mansion is a much older family graveyard enclosed within a stone wall. In the latter lies Mary Randolph, one of the proud Randolphs of the Roanoke valley and grand-Parke Custis's wife, who was then the mistress of Arlington, and there she found a final resting place, the first occupant of the family burial ground. Beside her lie Col. Parke Custis and Eleanor, his lovely wife, who was once the gayest belle in all the

MAKING UP HIS MIND.

Which way duty lay—whether to cast his fortunes with his kindred of the south or remain loyal to the government to which he owed his education as a soldier. He was a prayerful, upright man, who doubtless acted upon his honest convictions of right, unbiased by self-interest. At any rate, he snatched from that niggard Time, ways with graves on either hand—till sud-denly an opening in the trees discloses an immortal fame, though he died in pov-erty, self-exiled from his once beautiful home. His descendants mourn for their beloved Arlington, and like Rachael lamenting for her children, refuse to be com-forted; but it is to be hoped that when they come here to visit the graves of their ancestors and to bewail the grandeur which mansion appears snow white amid the surrounding green, but a nearer view shows it the more than 15,000 homes, and the many to be yellow.
