-Grass lands improve because the ground is protected from the effects of the sun, and also because the shading of the soil increases the number of bacteria and promotes nitrification; but when a plot is in grass for many years, and cattle trample it daily, it becomes exceedingly hard and compact, the plants becoming more and more restricted each year in their range for food and heat, while free access of air is prevented, and the water flows off from the surface, instead of penetrating the soil to assist the plants. The finer grasses begin to disappear and the coarser kinds come in because they are hardier. It is an advantage, therefore, to plow pasture land in order to reduce the soil to a fine condition and permit the rains, air and heat to enter in order that the plant food may be rendered soluble and available for crops. It is diffi-cult to convince some farmers that pastures should be plowed occasionally and other
