Greater Love Hath No Man.

"Tell me the story again"-pleaded a small childish voice, and the man paused in his feverish pacing to and fro to smile down at the tiny white face and dark-lashed eyes upraised to his.

lashed eyes upraised to his. "What again Basil?" he said, with a forced laugh. "How many times have I told it, little one?" "Don't know," chirped the child, "but I never grow tired. Tell me again Lylie." He seized the strong brown hand in his tiny wasted fingers, and looked up coax-ingly. "Wonder if I'll ever grow up to be such a big, brave man!" The man shuddered as he caught the child in his arms, and seated himself on the solitary rush chair that his prison boasted. He knew, though the child did not, that their days were numbered. The not, that their days were numbered. The two had been prisoners since the time of the rising of Mian Mir, when the blacks had fired the English settlement and forci-bly carried off Desmond Lisle, the second lieutenant, and little Basil North, the Colonel's youngest child, in revenge for the execution of their chief, Lotafee, and on the return of his brother, Ranunco, it was the intention of these inhuman fiends to offer the two captives of the injured chief as victims to avenge the murder of bis kinsman.

Though Desmond Lisle was kept secure-Inough Desmond Lisle was kept secure-ly watched and guarded, the little one was allowed to run wild, though always under the eyes of his captors. With the aid of a rusty nail and a piece of blue cloth torn from his epaulette, Lisle managed to trace a message, using the blood from a scratch in his arm as ink : "On the north hand of the size in the marshes-help-speedily.-Lisle." His idea was to obtain a piece of cork or a small bottle to which he might attach the cloth, and get the child to throw it in the river, but Basil could find neither and so the last forlorn hope had failed. For the fiftieth time he related the story of the brave warrior who had held the fort against fearful odds and at length had died within sight of the relief party, and the child listened with eager eyes and bated breath till he got to the part where they buried his hero-"An' they carved a wooden cross,' he broke in excitedly. "an' cut some words in the wood for the 'scription.' I 'member the words, but I can't say them, Lylie say them again." "Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friend," quoted Desmond softly. Basil's eyes glowed. "Wish I was a man," he sighed wistfully.

mab," he signed wistruly. "So you will be some day, I hope," said the man, consolingly bowing his head on the child's brown curls and registering a silent oath to end the tiny life with his own hands rather than see him fall into the hands of the torturers.

A dizziness that had been threatening many days began to steal over him— a deadly faintness which he vainly strove to master ; the awful suspense and torture of master; the awful suspense and torture of the last few days were beginning to tell on his strength and courage. Still holding the child in his arms, he staggered to a corner, where a heap of dried turf did duty for a bed, and falling down sank into un-consciousness. For a few minutes the child lay quiet, then, thinking his com-nanion slept, he sat up and pushed the paniou slept, he sat up and pushed the curls out of his eyes, a vague idea took shape and form in the baby brain, he thrust his little fingers into the pocket of

From a newspaper printed in the year 1770 is taken the following description of a dandy: "A few days ago a macaroni made his appearance in the assembly rooms at the Whitehaven, dressed in a mixed silk coat, pink satin waistcoat and breeches, covered with an elegant silk net, white silk stockings with pink clocks, pink satin shoes and large pearl buttons; a mushroom colored stock, covered with fine point lace; hair dressed remarkably high and stuck full of pearl pins."
