His Life Devoted to Bugs. For Forty Years a Brooklyn Entomologist Has Collected Insects.

Democratice Watchman.

When Mrs. Margaret Akhurst, widow of John Akhurst, of Brooklyn, the noted taxidermist and entomologist, who died last February, disposed of his valuable collection of insects, comprising more than 50,000 species of bugs, butterflies, and moths, to the zoological department of the University of Chicago for a sum going up into many thousands of dollars, the general public-not unduly interested in the bugs and and professor at Rutgers college, is president. The New York society me their collectors-received an inkling of the value of insects and insect lore.

The representative of the Chicago institution, Professor L. Tower, who came to New York to conduct the deal, had at his command a special train to transport the precious army of bugs to the Windy town.

Mr. Akhurst's collection-the second largest in America, it is said—was the result of a life time devoted to an exacting science and personal travels of exploration in many parts of the world as well as acquisition, by purchase, of the collections of other savauts here and abroad. Mr. Akhurst, don "Chronicle" savs: however, was not the only Brooklyn entomologist who won international renown in his specialty. In that borough there lives and works to day a man whose entire life has been saw thousands of solid buildings for p devoted to the study of bugs, and who is known by scientists the world over as one of the most expert eutomologists now liv-ing. His name is George Franck, and for over forty years he has devoted himself to the classification and definition of the myr-iad creatures that swarm the insect world. taut military centre. The whole raily every 15 miles, with sidings of great length

He has executed commissions for the British museum and our Department of Agriculture, and for such distinguished in-dividual amateur connoisseurs as Baron 10. Rothschild. He recently disposed of a group of the species Papilio atlas—rare col-ored bugs—to one of the English museums for $200.

A visit to his modest study at 1040 De- 000, and may be increased indefinitely Kalb avenue, Brooklyn, is interesting. Mr. Franck's collection of insects is very exten-sive, embracing an almost innumerable host of the species, every one of which is care-fully docketed and classified, and coming es the western wall; the concession aro from almost every country under the sun. He has a staff of 12 expert collectors, who are traveling all over the world in search of new and rare species of insects.

One of Mr. Franck's collectors recently sent him between 400 and 500 bugs from the Cypress swamps in Southern Florida. The species, which is known as the Eunica tatilla, is said to be very rare, each of the insects representing a cash value of about $50. It is of a purple blue, with a sprinkling of other colors thrown in, and exposed to the sunshine scintillates like a diamond.

There are several varieties of the common ordinary white and yellow butterfly, so well know in this country. Of these, the Pilrisar, which, in some mysterious way, as yet undiscovered by entomologists, was imported into this country from Europe, is very destructive.

It is especially down on its American cousin, the so-called cabbage butterfly. Indeed, wherever the one with the unpronouncable name appears, the cabbage butteafly speedily removes or is exterminated. Entomologists are, as yet, at a loss to explain the intense hatred of the two species for one another, and just in what manner the European disposes of his beloved American contemporary.

ican contemporary. These butterflies for a time ravaged Mas-sachusetts, and the Bay State for several years was put to an outlay of several mil-tion dollars to wards the bandcuffs that was given to him by the prison authorities when he was received at the institution t cases the practical value of the entomological science comes to the surface. But for the entomologists and their long years of pondering on the subject which the average man thinks of only as a joke, many a season's crop in different localities would suffer annual ruin.

The office of the state entomologist is a place for which most of the constitutions have made ample provision. An entomofederal authorities, and most of the Euro- under Russian control. pean governmints have entomologists in their employ.

Another sort of American butterfly, which is a native of the South, is the socalled Calies catapsilia. These fellows are very sociable and congregate in huge swarms that are sometimes big enough to effect a momentary eclipse of the sun It is very seldom that they are met in the North or East. When they are seen here they have been blown by a storm.

A few years ago Rockaway was literally inundated with the cataspilia. They filled all the trees, from which they hung in big clusters. The novel sight lasted only for a day, when another strong wind took the butterflies farther north, where the cold undoubtedly finished them.

A southern moth of great monetary value is the Philamuelua cupon chakoluski, of Florida, which is very rare and fetches $250 for each specimen.

There are a number of interesting and highly valuable kinds of moths among the species exotic to the United States. There is the so-called blue, of the genus mar-Thous, of South America, which fluctuates in monetary value from 50 cents to $50. Mr. Frauck sold one of them for the last named sum to the Brooklyn museum a short time age. The fly was a particularly rare one, with large deep blue wings, tinetared here and there with gold spots, that tended to give it an extremely multicolored appearance. It was a native of Brazil.

brought --

England, 15 years ago. To day, however, the species is comparatively well known and can be obtained at the moderate sum of between $15 and $20.

An interesting as well as comparatively recent development in entomology, and one possessed of much educational value, is furnished by the so-called "life histories" of the various insect which show the metamorphosis of the different species from the egg up until the final form, after which comes death. This novel method is accomplished by filling a jar, in small compartments, also of glass, are contained the various transformations which a bug, butterfly and moth go through from the chrysalis stage, and through the different grades until the insect attains its fullest and final form.

Mr. Franck has a very interesting collection of these life histories of insects, that form a very absorbing study.

The way the various insects are received and prepared for the museums and schools per. The next process is to "relax" them da.

lion dollars to get rid of the pest. In such spring, and to assist in the process a branch line will be made to Kirin, so that the soldiers on leaving the city will only have one hour's march to their quarters on the railway concession, instead of three days, as at present. In short, every place of importance through the country will be strategically commanded by Russian garrisons, and, to make assurance doubly sure, the number of Chinese soldiers is restricted, their arms are limited, smokeless powlogical bureau is also maintained by the der is forbidden, and they are completely What the result for Manchuria itself will be in the end it is impossible to say. The native habits, the native picturesqueness and arts will disappear, and Russian civilization, such as it is, will be extended. reads almost like a burlesque on "modern improvements." "It is now a Russian town," he says, "with handsome brick buildings, electric light and water laid on, a public park, a reading room and railway stall for 21 locomotives." For advantages like that, no doubt the native race was willing to give up something, and it has given up its freedom. There can be no mistake about it now; the provinces of Manchuria have become Russian property, and Russian diplomacy has won another bloodless victory-bloodless as far as Europe is concerned. So Russia moves forward like a glacier with persistent and undeviating power. Czars die and ministers change, but the death and change of men make no difference to her policy. When she draws back, it is only to leap the farther, but she seldom draws back, and her advance is often the most rapid when she speaks most fair. In this case we can do nothing new.

Took Him At His Word.

A captions critic of Beaver Dam, Wis found fault with the way women held fairs to help their churches, because he was always being called on to buy tickets. He decided to put a stop to it, and told the women of the Presbyterian church that if they wanted his money they would have to dig potatoes for it. In other words, he offered to give $20 to the woman who dug the most potatoes in two hours in the pres-ence of all such spectators as wished to look on. The women took him up, and thirty of them worked for the prize. Now the women of other churches are pestering him to give them a similar chance to make money .- Commercial Advertiser.

No Heavy Snow This Winter.

A weather prophet says that the real cold weather won't set in before the middle of December, and perhaps not then, for the reason that the snakes invariably take to their holes for the winter at least two months before cold weather sets in for good. That there will be no snow he regards as certain from the fact that the mountain grass and other wild growth not high enough to insure feed to the mountain birds and fowls.
