Few realize the enormous importance of printing in our daily life. To be sure, we all know that the modern newspaper is to a certain extent the result of great technical improvements; but of the scope of these improvements only the printer and the press maker is aware. In a spe cial issue devoted to "Modern Aids to Printing," the Scientific American tells just how important the printing industry is to the country. It shows in a few comparative illustrations how huge is the product of American presses; it analyzes the economic side of the industry; it describes laborsaving machines which do the work of dozens of men-all in a way that can be understood by a man who is not an expert on printing. The num. ber has been prepared with a thoroughness and care characteristic of the Scien'ific American.
