The Witch of Cragenstone

By ANITA CLAY MUNOZ. Author of "In Love and Truth"

Then, as he did not speak, she added mournfully, "Simon, didst know that the council hath ordered our Margaret to the prison?"

"Yea, the fearsome news hath reached me." "An' that the man she loved better than her life hath deserted her in her hour of peril?"

Kempster sat erect with a sudden "The courtier, Sir Godfrey La Fa-bienne?" he asked in surprise. She choked back a sob. "None other, as thou knowest. Ah, lackaday, bonny Margaret!" "Thy news doth surprise me," he said quietly, "as the knight had ever an open countenance and a manly bearing. But I ween 'tis not uncommon for love to grow between a man and woman all on one side." Hetty laid a supplicating hand on his arm.

Simon's breath came quickly, but his voice was stern as he said: "Hadst not better take a chair? Thou'lt find but poor comfort on the floor."

"Nay, Simon," she cried tearfully, "be not so churlish to thine old playtime friend! Hast forgotten Hetty little Hetty Taunston, who when thou wert but a lad, long before thy mother died, did rise at break o' day to meet her at the bars and help her drive the cows to grass?"

Simon turned his eyes toward her and regarded searchingly the sweet upturned face. What new coquetry was this? He set his teeth and steeled his heart against her.

"Such pleasant friendship as hath ever been between us, Simon," she began in a low voice, hesitatingly, "should not be broken off forever for want of a word of explanation. Simon, I-I remember the words thou did speak to me that day i' the dairy, when I was so set up because a coward courtier-a man who covered his black heart with fine raiment and wore a gallant bearing to deceive folk -did remark about my beauty that I flouted thee and did scorn the offer of thy honest heart and faithful love." Kempster regarded her seriously, anxiously; once he reached out his hand toward her, but drew it back hastily.

"So proud was I an' so full of idle dreams of a gay life in Paris that at the time I scarce did miss thee," she continued, "but anon I became lonely. dissatisfied, unhappy ar ly know what did ail me until I met the quiet scorn of thy glance and knew myself for the foolish, worthless maid that I was. Simon," she cried softly, "it hurt me to learn that I had lost the regard of one good man; my heart ached, an' I was sore troubled."

"Hetty"-he spoke her name sharp ly-"say no more unless thou doth truly mean thy words!" "I' truth, I mean so much more than I have said to thee," she went on sadly, "that I despair of ever making my lips frame the words my heart doth bid them speak."

A faint sound of the noisy clamoring of the crowd at the Mayland farm was swept in through the window by the breeze. Hetty shuddered and, edging nearer to Simon, laid her small hand on "Forgive me. No longer shut thy kind heart against me, Simon. Be my friend again. 'Tis all I ask."

He threw up his head with a sharp, indrawn breath. "Hetty, thou must speak out what thou dost mean!" he cried. "There can be but one thing between us, and that is-love! Before God, I will be thy friend, but I must be thy husband al-

A glow of color mantled her face and throat.

"If thou would deem me worthy," she faltered, with drooping head, "an' I were one-half good enough, I would ask thee to o'erlook the past, to forgive me, Simon, an' to take me for thy true and faithful wife. I would promise to love thee dearly.

With a glad cry he stooped and gathered her into his arms.

"No more such words, Hetty. I ha' listened long enough! Not worthy of me, a rough, hardworking farmer-the maid I ha' ever held so high above all other women."

He pressed her fondly to his strongly beating heart, saying tenderly, moved in his great joy to an unusual expression of sentiment, "Ah, Hetty, bright sunbeam of my life, that went away so coldly, praise God thou hast come back, bringing warmth to cheer the sad heart of a lonely man and light to set a glow of joy about his quiet home!"

CHAPTER XXIV. N a remote part of Cragenstone, far from the center of the village, built on a narrow defile that led from the main roadway and almost hidden by a wild growth of bushes and high trees, stood the prison where Margaret Mayland was confined. It was a primitive affair built roughly of logs, the interior comprising a row of dark cells, a long narrow passageway and a room for the keeper; also a large assembly hall where the village tribunal or council held its sessions. Here it was that they heard disputants, punished offenders and otherwise sat in judgment. So quiet were the inhabitants of this obscure mountain village, so regular in their manner of living, peaceable and law abiding, that the jail for lack of serving any use of great importance had long since fallen into a state of neglect. The heavy wooden shutters hung loosely on broken hinges; the apertures that emitted air and light into the building were covered with a rusty, iron grating, and the plain, wooden furniture was dilapidated to an extraordinary degree. In fact, the only part of the old prison that gave evidence of strength or resistance was the > reached from floor to roof. Before this door on the afternoon of the day following Margaret's arrest the old jailer, Matthew Allen, sat on a three legged stool sleepily watching the sun's gradual descent toward the horizon line. His good dog slept quietly at his side, and inside the prison the silence was intense.

huge front door of rough oak beams riveted together with iron bands that Sounds of horse's hoofs pounding the roadway fell on the dull ears of the jailer, who raised his head expectantly, for watching alone before the jail in an isolated part of the village was a monotonous existence even for a pious old man whose thoughts were wont to be nearer heaven than earth, and so the hope of a chance visitor with whom to discuss the exciting events of the previous day caused an expression of unusual intentness to spread over Matthew's countenance as he looked toward the turn. Apparently the sight of the old man was failing, for the rider had appeared before his vision and approached quite a few yards in his direction before he recognized the tall, gray clad form of Josiah Taunston. With noisy clatter the horse and rider advanced, the latter pulling rein in a cloud of dust before the huge door of the jail.

"I give thee good day, Matthew," he said. "How doth fare thy prisoner, the devil's young accomplice? Is she still with thee?" "Yea, master," the man responded seriously. "She is here." "Thy news is good," Josiah observed. 'Methought, perchance, to hear that she had disappeared. Gone up i' the air on a streak o' lightning or in a cloud of smoke, to join the revels of her evil companions."

At this sally he laughed a loud laugh of cruel enjoyment. The jailer looked about him fearfully, calling under his reath for the intercession of the saints.

"How doth thy prisoner conduct herself, Matthew Allen?" Taunston inquired, with curious gloating, "Doth she rave an' curse, tear down her hair an' call on that white livered coxcomb, that quondam lover of hers, to come to save her?"

"My son, her behavior is unusual," he answered, shaking his head from side to side in a way that implied his inability to understand. "The maid doth sit on the stool quietly, with head bowed an' hands pressed together o'er her heart, or else doth kneel on the floor and rest her head on the side of her hard pallet."

The jailer sighed.

"'Twere a sin, good sir, to feel a sympathy for such?" he asked in a trembling voice, uncertainly. Josiah, who had been leaning over toward the old man familiarly, now sat erect with a sudden motion.

"Matthew Allen," he cried sternly, "keep in mind always that thou doth come under the spell of this woman, under the snare of her devilish wiles. Her tricks are many, I tell thee, an' deep is her art. She doth but play a part to lure thee on! Hast already had a feeling of pity for her? Then beware, Matthew! Keep distant from the charm of her spell, and pray-pray constantly for a speedy deliverance from the sore affliction that hath been visited upon this village."

The jailer paled visibly, and his jaw dropped as with eyes wide open in terror he looked into the dark and menacing countenance of his visitor, who now pompously drew a paper from his belt and with stern majesty proceeded to address the old man. "Matthew Allen, keeper of Cragenstone jail, I have here an order from the chief councilor, herewith signed and sealed, commanding thee to bring the prisoner in thy charge-one Margaret Mayland, accused of witchcraft -before said councilor and council in the prison hall, where they will be assembled on the morrow at the hour of noon."

The jailer took the paper with trembling hands, stammering his surprise that so much haste had been deemed expedient.

"The council, as thou dost know, Matthew, is composed of wise men," he observed, "men who foresee danger and anticipate obstacles that might rise in their paths. Thy prisoner, jailer, hath a lover abroad known to have vast influence at court. As all the roads and passes are guarded by good Puritans heavily armed, his only way of escape was by the Sterndorf forest, where he must either die of starvation or become a prey to the hunger of the wolves." He snapped his fingers indifferently, as if he did not care which. "So our good councilmen, knowing the value of precaution and having fair knowledge that ofttimes evil doth triumph over good, deemed it expedient to set the trial at the earliest hour, an' I warrant thee, Matthew, that if the prisoner is found guilty and condemned to die her execution will follow speedily."

"Doth fear a rescue, master?" the jailer asked, alarm written on his countenance.

"'Tis hard telling what intention was in the man's mind when he left," Taunston replied soberly. "An we were careless enough to let the prisoner lie here a month or so mayhap the popinjay, safely surrounded by armed followers, would ride back to break down the door and bear the witch away. But," as he saw the pallor deepen on the old keeper's face, "rest easy, Matthew, an' have faith in the council."

Having finished his discourse, he turned his horse about.

"One moment stay thee," the jailer cried eagerly, laying a detaining hand on the horse's mane. "An' should this knight find means of escape through the forest and ride back to save his lady, this old prison would offer but poor resistance."

"With so much dispatch will the council seal the woman's fate," Josiah answered sternly, "that unless La Fabienne hath eagle's wings wherewith to speed him on his travels he will arrive too late. Fare thee well, Matthew.'

He started to ride away, then, pulling rein, suddenly brought his animal to a standstill.

"I a'most forgot to tell thee," he called over his shoulder, "that the council hath under advisement the matter of sending some other to remain with thee until the day that thy prisoner hath been freed or her doom sealed. God be with thee, Matthew."

Putting spurs to his horse, he rode away, and the keeper, calling his dog, turned the great key in the lock and entered the jail.

The next morning, despite the fact that a heavy mist hung over the mountain and a drizzling rain was falling, the quiet village of Cragenstone presented a scene of unusual activity. From the various houses people were issuing on their way to the council hall, and at the Sign of the Red Heart stern faced Puritans from far distances were arriving constantly, for the story of Margaret's arrest had been paged from mouth to mouth over the mountain, and in those credulous, superstitious times such a sensational event as the trial of a witch was the signal for a general holiday. Shepherds left their flocks, housewives their spinning wheels, the husbandman laid down his plow, and, donning their best attire, they walked or rode to the scene of interest. So all the morning along the roadways and before the various shops in the village groups of newcomers advanced or stood listening with mouths agape to the startling and fearful tales told them by the townspeople of "the accurst woman's doings" and the suffering she had caused those that had come under her evil spell. Precisely at the hour of noon, as the ell at the prison clange out the tidings that the time of Margaret's trial had arrived, the chief councilor and council, accompanied by two judges from Sterndorf renowned on the mountain for their knowledge of the law, made their way through the great concourse of people gathered before the iail. Trembling with excitement, old Matthew threw open the door, and they entered, walking slowly to the council chamber, followed at a respectful distance by the assembled people, who took seats quietly on the rough wooden benches prepared for them.

When all were seated and the clanging of the bell had ceased, the chief councilor rose and called loudly the name of Matthew Allen.

Immediately the jailer appeared at the door. "Matthew Allen," he said in solemn tones, "I call on thee in the name of the
