They laborer who works in Geo. Sherry's crew on the L. & T. R. R. walked into Blair's nothing transpired that throws any light ports of the standing committees the Edward K. and Miss Rebecca Rhoads will jewelry store to sell some chances on a gold watch. He showed the watch to R. Russel Blair who recognized it at once as one that had been stolen fron their store over six years ago.

In all the thousands of customer's watches that the Blairs have handled only one ever has been lost. This was the one and the story of its disappearaace and return is interesting. It happened in the Christmas season when so many small engraving orders and repairs are being made in addition to the rush of the holiday trade, that this ladies gold watch was left at the store to be cleaned. It was put in the usual place for keeping customer's watches until the time would come when it could be looked after. When that time came it was not to be found. While no charges were made for want of positive proof the senior member of the firm always entertained a suspicion as to where it had gone. Just six months later the Italian who produced it Saturday night was wandering through Mulberry St., in New York, and seeing a gold watch in the window of a pawn broker's office was attracted by it and inquired the price. He was offered the watch for $35.00 but finally succeeded in buying it for $25.00. He worked a while in New York, then in Philadelphia and finally came to Bellefonte: never dreaming that he possessed something that had been stolen from here years before and probably it would never have been known had he not decided to chance it off and wandered into Blair's to sell tickets. It cost him not only the watch, but a great deal of grief as to how he will reimburse those to whom he had already sold

The watch was a treasured trinket of Mrs. John A. Woodward, of Howard, who strangly enough, was lying dead at her home at the moment of its return and shortly before her death she had remarked that if it should ever turn up she wanted it given to a certain member
